QUESTIONS PRESENTED

Did the Secretary of Interior correctly refrain from displacing the State of Alaska's traditional role as manager of fish and game on federal lands (approximately 60% of Alaska), in that the definition of "rural area" contained in the state's comprehensive subsistence law is consistent with the use of the term "rural" in 16 U.S.C. § 3113 in the federal subsistence law?

Should the Secretary instead effecuate a management take-over, which would result in patchwork responsibility for Alaska's valuable, vulnerable, and in many cases migratory fish and game resources?

Is the term "rural" a relative one, varying with the context of its use, such that in determining its meaning in 16 U.S.C. § 3113 the lower court should have

(a) considered legislative history which reveals that Alaska's definition is consistent with underlying Congressional intent,

(b) deferred to the Secretary's express determination that Alaska's definition is consistent with the federal law, and

(c) refrained from relying on a superficial description in a tourist guidebook, outside of the record, in concluding that the Kenai Peninsula is "rural" within the "plain meaning" of that term?

PETITION FOR WRIT OF CERTIORARI TO THE UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE NINTH CIRCUIT

The State of Alaska respectfully petitions for a Writ of Certiorari to review the decision of the United States Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit in this case.

OPINIONS BELOW

The ninth circuit opinion is reported at 860 F.2d 312 (Appendix A, App. A-1). The memorandum and order of the United States District Court for the District of Alaska is unpublished (Appendix B, App. B-1).

JURISDICTION

The ninth circuit on October 24, 1988, issued an opinion reversing the district court's holding that Alaska's subsistence law was consistent with the federal subsistence law. The State of Alaska filed a petition for rehearing, and on January 4, 1989, the ninth circuit issued an order and an amended opinion denying the petition. The jurisdiction of this Court is invoked under 28 U.S.C. § 1254(1).

STATUTES INVOLVED

The Alaska National Interest Lands Conservation Act, Title VIII, ("ANILCA"), Pub. L. No. 96-487, 94 Stat. 2371, § 803, 16 U.S.C. § 3113 (1980), provides in relevant part that "subsistence uses" means "the customary and traditional uses by rural Alaska residents of wild, renewable resources for direct personal or family consumption" for specified purposes, including food, shelter, fuel, clothing, tools, transportation, handicrafts made of nonedible by-products, barter, sharing, and customary trade. (Emphasis added.)[1]

Alaska Statute ("AS") 16.05.940(30) provides in relevant part that "subsistence uses" means "the noncommercial, customary and traditional uses of wild renewable resources by a resident domiciled in a rural area of the state" for substantially the same purposes as those listed in 16 U.S.C. § 3113, described above. (Emphasis added.)

[1] Hereinafter, ANILCA provisions are cited by reference to 16 U.S.C. section number.

AS 16.05.940(25) defines "rural area" as "a community or area of the state in which the noncommercial, customary, and traditional use of fish or game for personal or family consumption is a principal characteristic of the economy of the community or area."

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

Alaska – perhaps no longer the "last frontier" – has been wracked by change, tied in large part to massive oil development, including oil fields adjacent to the Kenai Peninsula, the locus of this case. The state and Congress both recognized that sweeping economic changes and the accompanying population boom jeopardized the way of life in remote parts of the state where hunting and fishing are still far more important than cash-related activities. Such isolated areas have neither many jobs nor many grocery stores.

As a consequence of the growing competition for wildlife, Alaska (in 1978) and Congress (in 1980) both enacted laws giving subsistence uses a priority over other hunting and fishing. The state has managed fish and game on all lands in Alaska since statehood, and the federal law provides that it continue to do so if Alaska's subsistence law mirrors the federal law.

The Secretary of Interior ("Secretary") decided that the two laws are consistent, and that thus the inexperienced, underfunded, and unprepared federal agencies need not replace Alaska's management, which is founded on three decades of experience. The ninth circuit disregarded his finding entirely, and also refused to examine legislative history abundantly demonstrating the consistency. As a result, Alaska's fish and game may be endangered by a difficult and potentially devastating patchwork of state and federal management, and Congress' intent will be thwarted.

In 1980, Congress required the Secretary to take over management of fishing and hunting on federal public lands (comprising about 60% of Alaska) to provide for subsistence uses, unless Alaska chooses to define and protect those uses in a manner consistent with ANILCA. 16 U.S.C. § 3115(d). Under ANILCA, "subsistence uses" are the "customary and traditional uses by rural Alaska residents" of fish and game for specified purposes, and are entitled to a priority over other uses. 16 U.S.C. § 3113; 16 U.S.C. § 3114.

Earlier, in 1971, Congress had extinguished all aboriginal hunting and fishing rights in Alaska in exchange for 46 million acres and $962.5 million transferred to Alaska's Native people. Alaska Native Claims Settlement Act, Pub. L. No. 92-203, 85 Stat. 688 (1971), Sections 4(b) and 6(a). Thus, any federal rights to subsistence hunting and fishing in Alaska, including any which plaintiff might argue for, stem directly from the federal statutory scheme, and are available equally to Native and non-Native Alaskans, based on residence in remote areas highly reliant on fish and game.

In enacting ANILCA, Congress found that "the continuation of the opportunity for subsistence uses by rural residents of Alaska, including both Natives and non-Natives," is "essential" to their "physical," "economic,"

"traditional," "cultural," and "social existence." 16 U.S.C. § 3111. This is because, in part, "the situation in Alaska is unique in that . . . no practical alternative means are available to replace the food supplies . . . from fish and wildlife which supply rural residents dependent" on subsistence uses. Id. Those uses are "threatened by the increasing population of Alaska, with resultant pressure on subsistence resources," and by "increased accessibility of remote areas," among other things. Id.

ANILCA does not define "rural." Legislative history does, however, explain that Congress intends to protect customary and traditional uses in places where such uses have "played a long established and important role in the economy and culture of the community." S. Rep. No. 413, 96th Cong., 1st Sess. 269 (1979) ("Senate Report").

The Secretary determined that Alaska's comprehensive subsistence law is consistent with ANILCA, and, under 16 U.S.C. § 3115(d), he did not implement ANILCA's subsistence protections himself.[2]

[2] The Secretary initially certified compliance in 1982. App. A-5-6. Following Madison v. Alaska Dep't of Fish & Game, 696 P.2d 168 (Alaska 1985), holding that the state law did not limit subsistence to "rural residents," the Secretary notified Alaska that its laws were no longer consistent with ANILCA. App. A-6. In response, the Alaska legislature in 1986 modified the state subsistence statutes to limit subsistence to residents of rural areas, also defining "rural area." AS 16.05.940(25) and (30). The Secretary then concluded that Alaska's laws were again consistent with ANILCA, and thus refrained from taking any management measures with respect to subsistence fishing and hunting in Alaska. CR 11, ex. D; App. A-6-7.

In 1986, the Kenaitze Indian Tribe[3] alleged in district court that the state definition of "rural area" as places in the state in which noncommercial use of fish or game is "a principal characteristic" of the economy is not consistent with the term "rural" as used by Congress. The Kenaitzes also argued that the Kenai Peninsula – lying just south of Anchorage, Alaska's largest city and only metropolitan area[4] – is a rural place, and that they should be allowed to participate in subsistence uses there, in addition to or instead of the liberal nonsubsistence hunting, and sport and net fishing, opportunities already allowed on the peninsula.[5] The several hundred Kenaitzes who live on the Kenai are "widely dispersed" among the general population of 25,000 in the towns on the peninsula, including a suburban sprawl of over 10,000, made up of the Kenai's two largest communities.[6]

[3] Alaska has denied that the Kenaitzes are a federally recognized "tribe" under 25 C.F.R. part 83. CR 12. The Kenaitze Indian Tribe has been listed in 50 Fed. Reg. 6055, 6058 (Feb. 13, 1985) as a "Native entity," distinguished from a "tribe."

[4] Statistical Abstract, U.S. Census Bureau (1981)

[5] The Alaska Board of Fisheries found in 1981 that there are no longer customary and traditional uses of salmon on the peninsula, and subsistence fishing has not been authorized there since then, except for two non-road connected communities. Madison v. Alaska Dep't of Fish and Game, 696 P.2d 168, 172 (Alaska 1985). However, peninsula residents are still able to hunt and fish; they may hunt on the peninsula for at least 16 game species, and, in addition to sport fishing, have access to salmon by efficient gillnets through the personal use fishing regulations, with liberal limits of 25 fish per household head, and 10 for each dependent. 5 Alaska Administrative Code 77.525, 546, 547, and 548, and 80.115 – 170.

In ruling on the merits of the state's framework statutes, the district court held that Alaska's definition of "rural area" was consistent with ANILCA, relying on federal legislative history and the Secretary's certification. App. B-18-27. The court therefore denied the requested preliminary injunction. App. B-16-18. The district court stayed the other issue in the case – whether under the state's definition the Kenai Peninsula was correctly determined by Alaska to be a nonrural area – while the denial of the preliminary injunction was appealed.[7]

The ninth circuit reversed, holding that Alaska's definition is not consistent with ANILCA, and indicating that the Kenai Peninsula is rural under ANILCA. App. A-16. It remanded the case to the district court with instructions to issue a preliminary injunction. App. A-17. The decision was premised on a determination that "rural" has a plain meaning, regardless of its context. App. A-12, 15. The ninth circuit thus declined to even look at the legislative intent underlying ANILCA. App. A-15. It also did not acknowledge that the Secretary's decision not to take over fish and game management in Alaska is subject to judicial deference. App. A-8-9.

[7] Alaska had filed a motion to dismiss on the grounds that 16 U.S.C. § 3117(a) does not confer federal jurisdiction over a challenge to the state's statutes of general applicability approved by the Secretary under 16 U.S.C. § 3115(d). Alaska believes that the statute only authorizes suits against the state in federal court to challenge the adequacy of its implementing regulations once that approval has occurred. The district court denied the motion. If the court was correct in its finding of jurisdiction under 16 U.S.C. § 3117(a), the ninth circuit properly had jurisdiction under 28 U.S.C. § 1292(a)(1) over the appeal. However, during the appeal Alaska specifically noted that it reserved its jurisdictional challenge, which will be ripe for appeal upon the eventual conclusion of the case in the district court.

REASONS FOR GRANTING THE WRIT

A. Summary

This case is critically important to rural Alaskans Congress intended to protect, because it dilutes the subsistence priority by dramatically expanding the class eligible for subsistence hunting and fishing. It will also have a striking effect on federal agencies that may, against the Secretary's own judgment, have to assume responsibilities they have neither budget, manpower, nor inclination for. Further, it is of profound concern to the State of Alaska which may lose management over fish and game on 60 percent of its area. The resulting patchwork of management responsibility will make protecting the resources that are the touchstone of subsistence dramatically problematic, since many fish stocks and game populations are migratory, and do not respect land ownership boundaries in their movements.

In rendering the decision below the ninth circuit so far departed from the accepted and usual course of judicial proceedings as to call for an exercise of this Court's power of supervision. Moreover, the lower court has decided a federal question in a way which conflicts with this Court's applicable decisions.

In purporting to apply the plain meaning rule to construe an ambiguous statutory term, and ignoring relevant legislative history and administrative interpretation, the ninth circuit has clearly refused to follow this Court's guidance about the proper role of the judiciary vis-a-vis Congress and the Executive Branch.[8] Further, the court's own examples of the purported plain meaning of "rural" reveal that it has no plain meaning and is ambiguous.

The decision below so flouts the rules laid down by this Court on the proper use of legislative history and the respect due to administrative interpretations that an exercise of this Court's powers of supervision is called for. This is especially true since the ninth circuit in one breath declares the term "rural" to have a plain meaning, and in

[8] The author of the ninth circuit decision is an outspoken critic of reference to legislative history in statutory interpretation. Judge Kozinski's recent article, "Hunt for Laws' 'True' Meaning Subverts Justice," in the January 31, 1989, Wall Street Journal, concludes sharply:

> Lawyers must be taught that the plain language of the statute sometimes makes litigation pointless – if not frivolous. The time has come for the judiciary to make clear once again that we are a nation of laws, not legislative histories.

Unfortunately for the Secretary and for Alaska, in his quest to eradicate the scourge of legislative history Judge Kozinski has refused to acknowledge that in this case the term "rural" is a relative one, without a plain meaning, and has as a result interpreted it in a way demonstrably contrary to Congressional intent.

the next gives a series of examples of that meaning which, when applied to Alaska, produce contradictory results. Indeed, it is so clear that the Secretary's decision not to take over fish and game management in Alaska was correct, as was his determination that the Alaska definition of "rural area" is consistent with Congress' intent, that this would be an appropriate situation for this Court to order summary reversal, under Supreme Court Rule 23.1.

B. Rural Alaskans, federal and state agencies, and fish and game in Alaska will be profoundly and adversely affected by the lower court decision.

This case presents issues of vital importance to Native and non-Native Alaskans living in remote parts of the state. The ninth circuit has significantly diluted the subsistence protections of ANILCA by extending them to residents of places like the Kenai Peninsula, just south of Anchorage – a place even the ninth circuit admits currently has an economy "based primarily on work for cash," because of its "proximity to Anchorage." App. A-3. By substantially expanding the class eligible for subsistence hunting and fishing, the lower court's decision could mean that in some places in Alaska, even if non-subsistence harvests have been closed to protect subsistence uses, there will be such increased competition among the swollen numbers of subsistence users that the group Congress actually intended to protect will suffer.

Profoundly fundamental issues of state and federal authority are also presented, for the finding of inconsistency could severely disrupt resource management in Alaska. Fish and game management has been a traditional state responsibility since the founding of the Union. While the federal government may have the power to regulate fish and wildlife on federal lands under the Property Clause of the United States Constitution, art. IV, sec. 3, cl. 2, that power will generally be exercised only after a state declines the opportunity to retain its management authority. See, e.g., Kleppe v. New Mexico, 426 U.S. 529 (1976). Up to this time, under ANILCA 16 U.S.C. § 3116 the Secretary has only been monitoring Alaska's hunting and fishing regulations adopted under its framework statutes. He has not actually managed fishing and hunting directly, as is required if those general laws are not consistent with ANILCA. 16 U.S.C. § 3115(d).

A consequence of the Secretary assuming management will be patchwork responsibility between federal and state agencies over migrating fish stocks and game populations, which care nothing for land ownership patterns. This split jurisdiction will increase substantially the difficulties faced in carefully husbanding these resources, so important to all Alaskans, and of paramount significance to subsistence users in the state's rural areas. Concerns that "splinter management" would "threaten effective resource protection" were expressed to Congress, and Congress concluded that "it is appropriate for the state to have responsibility for the day-to-day regulation" of all fish and game in Alaska rather than for a patchwork approach to be the management scheme of choice. H. Rep. No. 96-97, Part I, 96th Cong., 1st Sess. 540 (1979) and H. Rep. No. 1045, Part I, 95th Cong., 2d Sess. 184 (1978).

C. The lower court's own conflicting examples demonstrate that "rural" does not have a "plain meaning."

This Court has established a methodology for interpreting statutes, as explained in Chevron U.S.A. v. Natural Resources Defense Council, 467 U.S. 837, 843-45 (1984). If Congress has "directly spoken to the precise question at issue," that is "the end of the matter." However, if the statute is "silent or ambiguous" with respect to the specific issue, the court looks to the legislative history of the statute, and defers to any administrative interpretation as long as it is based on a "permissible construction of the statute."

The decision in this case purposts to follow that methodology, but actually does not. The court states that the term "rural is not difficult to understand; it is not a term of art," that it is "a standard word in the English language." App. A-12. Therefore, the court refuses to even consider legislative history because of the word's "plain meaning." App. A-15.

However, in trying to demonstrate that the term "rural" has a "plain meaning," the court gives a number of internally inconsistent examples of how the term is used in other instances. When applied to Alaska in general, and the Kenai Peninsula in particular, those examples produce contradictory results.

Initially, the court notes that "rural" is commonly understood to refer to sparsely populated areas "where the economy centers on agriculture or ranching." App. A-12. Examining an area's economy in determining whether it is rural is consistent with Congress' focus on "economic development and rural character," and on places in the state where fish and wildlife use has played a "long established and important role in the economy and culture." Senate Report at 233, 269. However, Alaska's error (in the ninth circuit's view) apparently was in identifying the importance of fish and game as the critical determinant, instead of agriculture or ranching.

Restricting "rural" to areas where the economy centers on farming and ranching would result in only a handful of areas in Alaska being rural – mainly several river valleys. Congress, on the other hand, recognized that the term rural was to encompass communities and areas "scattered throughout the state." Senate Report at 233. Further, the few Alaskan agricultural areas are probably among the places in the state least dependent on wildlife use. In contrast, vast reaches accessible only by air and heavily dependent on hunting and fishing would be nonrural under this approach.

The lower court also indicated that defining rural by excluding from the definition communities of a certain population would be permissible: "More broadly, rural is the antonym of urban and includes all areas in between cities and towns of a particular size." App. A-12. The court then cited a number of federal statutory definitions which it termed "consistent with conventional understanding." App. A-13.

One cited definition is 42 U.S.C. § 1395ww(d)(2)(D) (Supp. IV 1986). App. A-13. That statute defines rural area for the purpose of computing social security payments to hospitals as any area outside an urban area, which in turn is defined as an area within a "Standard Metropolitan Statistical Area." Under that approach, all of Alaska except Anchorage would be rural, see Statistical Abstract, U.S. Census Bureau (1981), including three communities which Congress specifically identified as not being rural under ANILCA: Ketchikan, Juneau, and Fairbanks. Senate Report at 233.

Under another cited definition, used by the U.S. Census Bureau, only villages of less than 2,500 people would be rural. App. A-12-13. Under that approach, many Alaska communities which now are classified as rural would be reclassified as nonrural, including four of the five communities specifically identified by Congress as examples of rural communities under ANILCA: Bethel (pop. 4006), Nome (pop. 3191), Barrow (pop. 3075), and Kotzebue (pop. 2633). Senate Report at 233; Alaska Department of Labor, Alaska Population Overview, 1985 Estimates (1987). In addition, using that definition, the three largest communities on the Kenai Peninsula would not be rural: Kenai City (pop. 6518), Soldotna (pop. 3818), and Homer (pop. 3632). Id.

The court's own examples of the term rural thus demonstrate that the word does not have a plain meaning. The simple reality is that the term "rural" is a relative one, and its meaning depends on the context in which, and purpose for which, it is used.[9] For example, it is not clear how another of the "common sense" meanings of rural cited by the court could reasonably be used to provide a priority for subsistence hunting and fishing. The example ties the rurality of an area to the presence or lack of "mortgage credit for lower and moderate-income families," a key component in the definition used in the Housing Act, 42 U.S.C. § 1490. App. A-13.

[9] The canon of construction interpreting doubtful terms in favor of Indians applies only to circumstances where Indians affected by the law would receive a more favorable result

The court nonetheless applied the plain meaning rule and, relying on Amoco Production Co. v. Village of Gambell, 480 U.S. 531 (1987), determined that resort to legislative history was unnecessary and inappropriate. App. A-15. The court's own examples demonstrate that the term rural can have a variety of meanings – i.e., that it is ambiguous – and does not have a plain meaning. The court should have both looked at relevant legislative history and deferred to any administrative interpretation as long as it is based on a permissible construction of the statute. Chevron U.S.A. v. Natural Resources Defense Council, 467 U.S. 837, 843-45 (1984).

under one interpretation. See generally Oliphant v. Suquamish Indian Tribe, 435 U.S. 191 (1978). In the instant case, especially in light of the varying examples of the meaning of "rural" in the decision, Alaska Natives as a whole will not necessarily benefit from the interpretation urged by the Kenaitzes, and certainly would fare worse under the lower court's "agriculture and ranching" and Census Bureau examples.

D. Federal legislative history fully supports Alaska's definition of "rural area," and demonstrates that the "plain meaning" identified by the lower court is contrary to Congressional intent.

The court's application of the plain meaning rule clearly was incorrect. Moreover, if the court had considered the relevant legislative history, it would have discovered that the Secretary's administrative interpretation conforms to the intent underlying ANILCA. In contrast, the court's purported plain meaning approach actually produces results that are demonstrably inconsistent with Congress' intent.

In the legislative history of ANILCA Congress does not reference population or density levels in conjunction with a discussion of rural. Instead, Congress specifically identifies some communities which are not rural under ANILCA: Ketchikan, Juneau, Fairbanks, and Anchorage. Senate Report at 233. Three of those communities would, however, be rural under at least one definition apparently approved by the court. At the same time, other communities which Congress expressly states are rural under ANILCA – Bethel, Nome, Barrow, and Kotzebue – would not be rural under at least one definition apparently approved by the court. Id.

More specific to the instant case, when Congress enacted ANILCA in 1980, it apparently assumed that the Kenai was not rural, and that there were no subsistence uses there that required federal protection. The Kenai National Wildlife Refuge, consisting of nearly 2 million acres (the size of Rhode Island and Delaware combined), was the only one of the 16 refuges in Alaska established or expanded by ANILCA that did not have the continuation of subsistence uses listed as a statutory purpose. 16 U.S.C. § 668dd. In reaching the opposite conclusion, the ninth circuit relied on a brief description in The Milepost, a travelers' guide outside the record, designed to promote tourism, to decide that the Kenai is rural. App. A-7. In so doing, the court ignored its own acknowledgment that the Kenai's "proximity to Anchorage" and the development of adjacent oil fields has "transformed the peninsula's economy to one based primarily on work for cash." App. A-3, 20.

Congress intended to protect customary and traditional uses in places where such uses have "played a long established and important role in the economy and culture of the community," an intent clearly reflected in Alaska's definition. Senate Report at 269. Another example supporting the correctness of the state's definition is the explicit statement that "the direction of the economic development and rural character of such communities may change over time." Id. at 233. These statements evidence that Alaska's definition of rural areas as places in the state where the noncommercial use of fish and game is "a principal characteristic of the economy" is consistent with Congressional intent.

E. The Secretary's consistency determination and concomitant decision not to displace state management on federal lands in Alaska is due deference under principles of statutory construction and under separation of powers doctrine.

The ninth circuit ignored the principles of statutory construction set out in Chevron U.S.A. v. National Resources Defense Council, 467 U.S. 837, 843-45 (1984), when it gave no significance whatsoever to the Secretary's decision not to begin managing fishing and hunting in Alaska, nor to his certification that the Alaska law was fully consistent with ANILCA. App. A-8-9. The ninth circuit concluded that, once Alaska had adopted an approved management regime, the Secretary no longer had authority to act. Id. His second certification of consistency, according to the court, "had no legally operative effect" and was not "the type of agency action to which a court owes deference." Id.

The court ignored ANILCA's mandate that the federal management scheme is stayed in favor of state management only if Alaska's laws "are consistent with" ANILCA. 16 U.S.C. § 3115(d). If Alaska's laws are inconsistent, the Secretary must implement ANILCA's subsistence priority on federal lands. ANILCA affords him no alternative, and his determination that he does not need to do so because the laws are consistent is entitled to deference, especially when, as here, it is abundantly clear that his decision is consistent with legislative history.

Thus, the lower court's refusal to consider the Secretary's interpretation violates the statutory construction principles established by this Court. What is worse, however, is the failure of the ninth circuit to respect the constitutional separation of powers doctrine. Under that doctrine, policy decisions are left to the political branches of government. Chevron U.S.A., 467 U.S. at 864-66. In this case, the ninth circuit simply concluded that the Secretary's policy decision not to take over management in Alaska in light of the state's statutory subsistence protections did not conform to its notion of an appropriate policy. In doing so, the court ignored a fundamental precept of our constitutional system: "Our Constitution vests such responsibilities in the political branches." TVA v. Hill, 437 U.S. 153, 195 (1978).

This Court repeatedly has emphasized the importance of the separation of powers doctrine: "Time and time again we have reaffirmed the importance in our constitutional scheme of the separation of governmental powers into three coordinate branches." Morrison v. Olson, 467 U.S. ___, 101 L.Ed.2d 569, 607 (1988). The ninth circuit decision conflicts with all of those principles.

CONCLUSION

For the foregoing reasons, the ninth circuit's decision should be reviewed and reversed by this Court. The Petition for Writ of Certiorari should be granted, or the decision below should be reversed summarily.

UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE NINTH CIRCUIT

KENAITZE INDIAN TRIBE, Plaintiff-Appellant, v. STATE OF ALASKA, Defendant-Appellee.	No. 87-4110 D.C. No. CV-86-367 ORDER AND AMENDED OPINION

Appeal from the United States District Court for the District of Alaska
H. Russel Holland, District Judge, Presiding

Argued and Submitted
August 1, 1988 – Anchorage, Alaska

Filed October 24, 1988
Amended January 4, 1989

Before: Alex Kozinski, John T. Noonan, Jr. and David R. Thompson, Circuit Judges.

Opinion by Judge Kozinski; Concurrence by Judge Noonan with whom Judge Thompson joined

ORDER

The panel has voted to amend its opinion by adding a new footnote 8 after the word "indirection" in column 2, line 15 of 860 F.2d at 318:

> The state argues that article IV, section 4 of the Constitution, which "guarantee[s] to every State in this Union a Republican Form of Government," and the tenth amendment, which reserves to the states powers not delegated to the federal government, preclude a federal court from directing the state to amend its laws to make them consistent with ANILCA. Whether or not this proposition is correct, it has no relevance here. We do not purport to be directing the state to amend its laws; it is free to eschew any further entanglement with the federal government by advising the Department of the Interior that it is withdrawing from its role in administering ANILCA.

Existing footnote 8 is accordingly renumbered as footnote 9.

The panel has voted to deny the petition for rehearing and to reject the suggestion for rehearing en banc. The full court has been advised of the suggestion for rehearing en banc and no judge of the court has requested a vote thereon. Fed. R. App. P. 35(b). The petition for rehearing is denied and the suggestion for rehearing en banc is rejected.

KOZINSKI, Circuit Judge*:

We travel to the northern reaches of our circuit to resolve a dispute implicating two recurring Alaskan motifs: on the one hand, the clash between traditional and modern ways of life; on the other, fish. The Kenaitze Indian Tribe claims that the state of Alaska is attempting to evade federal legislation creating a priority for subsistence fishing by residents of rural areas. The controversy turns on the meaning of the word "rural" as used in the Alaska National Interest Lands Conservation Act (ANILCA), Pub. L. No. 96-487, 94 Stat. 2371 (1980)(codified as amended in scattered sections of Titles 16 and 43 of the United States Code).

I

The Kenaitze, a tribe numbering approximately four hundred, have lived on the Kenai Peninsula, in southern Alaska, for hundreds of years. For most of their history, the Kenaitze have pursued a way of life dominated by subsistence fishing and hunting. In recent years, however, the area's proximity to Anchorage has made the Kenai Peninsula a center of commercial and sport fishing, and has transformed the Peninsula's economy to one based primarily on work for cash. Subsistence fishing has been crowded out by commercial harvesting and by sport fishing, the latter pursued with all the zeal of a Crusade. See Medred, Combat Fishing, Anchorage Daily News, May 15, 1988, at J-1 (describing "Alaska streams sometimes hidden behind a wall of humanity"); Freedman, Fish Hard Die Free: Profiles in Carnage, We Alaskans (Anchorage Daily News Magazine), Aug. 7, 1988, at N-7, N-8 ("It's said there are two kinds of people in Alaska: Those Who Fish, and Those Who Watch"); Jenkins, So Many Fishermen, So Few Flies, Anchorage Daily News, Aug. 10, 1988, at B-1.

In response to similar changes occurring throughout Alaska, Congress enacted ANILCA in 1980. The Act contains a number of provisions relating to conservation on federal lands, including the establishment of new units of the National Park, National Forest and National Recreation Area systems. Title VIII of ANILCA protects subsistence fishing by giving such fishing a priority over other types of fishing in federal waters in rural areas. 16 U.S.C. §§ 3111-3126 (1982 & Supp. IV 1986).

Congress prefaced Title VIII with a declaration that "the continuation of the opportunity for subsistence uses by rural residents of Alaska . . . is essential to Native physical, economic, traditional, and cultural existence. . . ." Id. § 3111(1). Congress further found that because "continuation of the opportunity for subsistence uses of resources on public and other lands in Alaska is threatened by the increasing population of Alaska [and] by increased accessibility of remote areas containing subsistence resources," id. § 3111(3), it was necessary for Congress "to protect and provide the opportunity for continued subsistence uses on the public lands by Native and non-Native rural residents." Id. § 3111(4).[1]

ANILCA accordingly provides that "the taking on public lands of fish and wildlife for nonwasteful subsistence uses shall be accorded priority over the taking on such lands of fish and wildlife for other purposes." Id. § 3114. Section 3113 defines "subsistence uses" as "the

[1] Early drafts of Title VIII protected only subsistence uses by Native Alaskans. When the state advised Congress that the Alaska Constitution might bar the enforcement of a preference extended only to Natives, Congress broadened the preference to include all "rural residents." 126 Cong. Rec. 29, 278-79(1980)(statement of Rep. Udall). The state's subsequent narrowing of the definition of "rural residents" to exclude the native villages here, see pp. 13310-12 infra, is thus more than a little ironic.

customary and traditional uses by rural Alaska residents of wild, renewable resources" for a variety of uses. Id. § 3113 (emphasis added).

The statute directs the Secretary of the Interior to establish the administrative structure necessary for the implementation of the statute. Id. § 3115(a)-(c). The federal regulatory scheme is to be stayed, however, if the state of Alaska enacts laws "which are consistent with, and which provide for the definition, preference, and participation specified in, sections 3113, 3114, and 3115 of this title." Id. § 3115(d). The Secretary is to monitor the state's performance in this regard, and to report periodically to appropriate congressional committees. Id. § 3116. ANILCA authorizes any person or organization aggrieved by the failure of the state or federal government to enforce the subsistence priority set forth in section 3114 to file a civil action for injunctive relief in federal district court. Id. § 3117. Section 3117 provides the jurisdictional basis for this lawsuit.

Given the choice between federal regulation or self-regulation with federal oversight, Alaska chose the latter. The state enacted the necessary statutes in 1978, while Congress was still working on the final version of ANILCA. Pursuant to the state statutes, the state Joint Boards of Fish and Game promulgated regulations which, among other things, defined rural as describing any area other than a community with a population of 7,000 or more. Residents of these rural communities were to be afforded ANILCA's priority for subsistence fishing. In 1982, the Secretary of the Interior certified that the state legislative program was in compliance with ANILCA.

Letter from Secretary James Watt to Governor Jay Hammond (May 14, 1982). This certification suspended federal regulation and left the state in charge of implementing ANILCA.

Soon after certification was completed, the Joint Boards of Fish and Game issued a new regulation, which materially altered the definition of rural and substantially narrowed the areas where subsistence fishing would be afforded a priority. According to the new definition, identification of a rural area depended on ten criteria, including the current pattern of subsistence uses by groups inhabiting the area. The principal effect of the new regulation was to deny the subsistence fishing priority to residents of areas dominated by a cash economy. In 1985 this regulation was invalidated by the Alaska Supreme Court as inconsistent with state law. Madison v. Alaska Dep't of Fish & Game, 696 P.2d 168 (Alaska 1985). The Alaska Legislature revived the regulation by amending the statute to conform to it. As amended, the statute defines "rural area" to mean "a community or area of the state in which the noncommercial, customary, and traditional use of fish or game for personal or family consumption is a principal characteristic of the economy of the community or area."Alaska Stat. § 16.05.940(25) (1987).

Invalidation of the earlier regulation in Madison had caused the Interior Department to advise the Governor of Alaska that the state had fallen out of compliance with ANILCA. After the new legislation, the Assistant Secretary of the Interior for Fish and Wildlife and Parks wrote a letter to the Governor of Alaska purporting to certify that the state was once again in compliance. Letter from Assistant Secretary William Horn to Governor Bill Sheffield (Nov. 7, 1986).

The Kenai Peninsula qualifies as a rural area under the state's original definition of the term, but not under the new definition. While vast areas of the Peninsula are covered by countryside and wilderness, its economy is no longer dominated by subsistence and barter.[2] This means that under the new state scheme, subsistence fishing in the Kenai is denied the priority provided by ANILCA. The Kenaitze, some of whom continue to engage in subsistence fishing, brought suit challenging this change in state law. The Tribe sought an order directing the state to promulgate regulations defining rural in a manner that would implement the federal subsistence priority. Along with the complaint, the Tribe filed a motion for summary judgment and asked the court for a preliminary injunction to prevent the state from enforcing its existing statutory and regulatory definition of rural. The district court denied both motions, and granted the state's cross-motion for partial summary judgment on the issue of [2] Counsel for the state graphically described the situation at oral argument: "The Kenai Peninsula has Sears, Safeway stores and malls." True enough. Yet the Kenai has a long way to go before it approaches anything resembling an urban community. Its 25,000 inhabitants are spread over an area of 16,000 square miles, roughly the size of New Hampshire and Vermont combined. The World Almanac 573, 418 (1988). "The scenery is varied and beautiful. The massive peaks and broad ice fields of the Kenai Mountains form the spine of the peninsula, dropping away to the great forested plateau of the western area. Its many lakes, rivers and streams make the Kenai a prime sport-fishing destination." The Milepost 336 (40th ed. 1988).

whether Alaska was in compliance with ANILCA. The Tribe took an interlocutory appeal from the denial of the preliminary injunction. 28 U.S.C. § 1292(a)(1)(1982).

II

We must first consider whether we interpret the statute de novo, or whether we owe deference to the interpretation already adopted by the Department of the Interior and the state of Alaska, as the entities charged with the statute's enforcement. The state, supported by the Secretary as amicus,[3] argues that we owe deference to the interpretation advanced by the Secretary. Specifically, the state points to the 1986 letter from the Assistant Secretary for Fish and Wildlife and Parks, which approves the state's revised definition of rural. Since the Secretary is charged with implementing ANILCA, the argument goes, we should defer to his determination that the state's definition of rural conforms with federal law.[4]

Deference to an administrative agency's construction of a statute is appropriate, however, only where the agency is entrusted with the administration of the statute. Chevron U.S.A., Inc. v. Natural Resources Defense Council, Inc., 467 U.S. 837, 844 (1984); Blum v. Bacon,457 U.S. 132,

[3] Plaintiffs sued only the state, not the Secretary of the Interior. As noted, this type of lawsuit is authorized by ANILCA, 16 U.S.C. § 3117, and is designed to bring state regulation into compliance with federal law.

[4] The Secretary delegated the authority to make this determination to the Assistant Secretary for Fish and Wildlife and Parks. U.S. Dep't of the Interior, Departmental Manual 209 DM 6.1 (May 2, 1983)(No. 2489).

141 (1982). We defer, therefore, only where the agency acts pursuant to a delegation of statutory authority. The 1986 letter was not such an action. The Secretary's responsibility in administering the Act includes an initial certification that the state has implemented a statute that complies with ANILCA and that federal regulation should accordingly be withheld. 16 U.S.C. § 3115(d). Once the state regulatory scheme is in place, the Secretary's powers are limited to monitoring the state's implementation of its legislative program and making periodic reports to Congress. Id. § 3116. ANILCA thereafter vests the power to approve or disapprove the state's performance in the courts alone. Id. § 3117(a).[5] The Assistant Secretary's 1986 letter purporting to recertify the state's compliance thus had no legally operative effect. Not being an exercise of the Secretary's statutory authority, it did not constitute the type of agency action to which a court owes deference.[6]

[5] Although section 3117(a) requires the "exhaustion of any State or Federal (as appropriate) administrative remedies which may be available," it is clear in context that "Federal (as appropriate) administrative remedies" refers to remedies that would exist if the state had not supplanted ANILCA's regulatory scheme with its own. Because the state has accepted section 3115(d)'s invitation to supersede federal regulation, there is no federal administrative remedy for a plaintiff to exhaust. The state, however, makes no claim that the Kenaitze have failed to exhaust any available state administrative remedies.

[6] While we need not defer to the Secretary, his views are nevertheless valuable to the court in light of the Secretary's intimate familiarity with the statutory scheme and his supervisory responsibilities over the federal lands in question. We have given the Secretary's views, as expressed in the government's amicus brief, due consideration.

A more interesting question is posed by the suggestion that we defer to the state's interpretation of ANILCA. The state's claim to deference is based on the fact that it performs functions not unlike those of a federal agency charged with implementing an Act of Congress. State law here operates like an agency regulation; state authorities, therefore, can claim to stand in the shoes of federal regulators.

While this argument is not without appeal, we reject it. Deference to a federal agency's interpretation of a statute is based in part on the expertise it possesses in implementing federal policy in the general subject area. See Aluminum Co. of America v. Central Lincoln Peoples' Util. Dist., 467 U.S. 380, 389-90 (1984). While Alaska has a long history of managing large wilderness areas, it lacks the expertise in implementing federal laws and policies and the nationwide perspective characteristic of a federal agency. Federal agencies are also entitled to deference because their activities are subject to continuous congressional supervision by virtue of Congress's powers of advice and consent, appropriation, and oversight. Such direct and continuous congressional supervision is absent when state authorities are doing the regulating.

Most fundamentally, unlike a federal agency, the state is delegated no authority under ANILCA. The statute only provides that if the state wishes to regulate in a manner consistent with federal law, federal regulation will be withheld. ANILCA does not assign any particular functions to the state as, indeed, it could not. As a separate sovereign, the state is at all times free to refuse to regulate; Congress could not compel it to do so. If the state refuses, the Department of the Interior will step in and do the job. The state's role is thus more accurately characterized as supplanting the federal regulatory scheme, rather than implementing it. Deference is not appropriate.

We must therefore determine the statute's meaning on our own. It is to this task we now turn.

III

This case boils down to what Congress meant when it legislated a priority for "customary and traditional uses by rural Alaska residents of wild, renewable resources." 16 U.S.C. § 3113 (emphasis added). The state has selected an unusual definition of the term rural, a definition that excludes most areas normally understood to be covered by the term. As Alaska defines the word, an area is rural only if its economy is dominated by subsistence fishing and hunting; it excludes areas characterized primarily by a cash economy, even though a substantial portion of the residents may engage in subsistence activities. The state's definition would exclude practically all areas of the United States that we think of as rural, including virtually the entirety of such farming and ranching states as Iowa and Wyoming.

The state argues that its definition of rural best promotes ANILCA's policy of protecting the subsistence way of life by excluding areas where that way of life has already been supplanted by a cash economy. The state's argument stands the process of statutory construction on its head. We look to policy in interpreting the statutory language; we do not rewrite the language to conform to the policy.[7] While statutory words sometimes have more than one meaning, and interpreting the statute may require judgment as to which of these meanings Congress contemplated, an interpreting body may not invent a completely new meaning for a statutory term. Any other rule of construction would rob statutes of binding force and allow free rein to those who implement federal statutes to do what they wish rather than what Congress directed.

The term rural is not difficult to understand; it is not a term of art. It is a standard word in the English language commonly understood to refer to areas of the country that are sparsely populated, where the economy centers on agriculture or ranching. See Webster's Third New International Dictionary 1990 (1981). More broadly, rural is the antonym of urban and includes all areas in between cities and towns of a particular size. See id.

The term has been used by the federal government in a variety of other contexts, all of them consistent with conventional understanding. The U.S. Census Bureau, for example, divides the population into two categories. The urban population consists of people living in communities of 2,500 or more, while the rural population comprises everyone else. U.S. Dep't of Commerce, Bureau of the Census, 1980 Census of Population, vol. I, ch. B., part 3, [7] The state does not, of course, claim to be rewriting the statutory language. No one ever admits to taking a blue pencil to an Act of Congress. But precisely the same end is achieved through creative interpretation. Assigning exotic definitions to statutory terms alters the statute just as surely and effectively as changing the statutory language.

at A-2. Many federal statutes use the word rural in its conventional sense. See, e.g., 42 U.S.C. § 1395ww(d)(2)(D) (Supp. IV 1986) (for purposes of computing Social Security payments to hospitals for inpatient hospital services, "rural area" defined as any area outside a metropolitan area); 42 U.S.C. § 1490 (Supp. IV 1986) (for purposes of applying Title V of Housing Act of 1949, "rural area" defined as "any open country, or any place, town, village, or city which is not part of or associated with an urban area" and where the population does not exceed certain limits). The Federal Communications Commission and the Federal Housing Administration similarly define rural in terms of an area's population. See National Cable Television Ass'n v. FCC, 747 F.2d 1503, 1507 (D.C. Cir. 1984); 7 C.F.R. § 1944.10 (1988). We are aware of no federal statute or regulation that uses the word rural in any sense other than the commonly accepted one.

The state contends, nevertheless, that its definition of the term is appropriate in the context of ANILCA because it best serves the congressional goal of protecting the traditional subsistence way of life in areas where that way of life is predominant. Even if we agreed that this approach more clearly accomplishes the purpose behind ANILCA -- a proposition we would be reluctant to endorse -- Congress passes laws, not purposes. What matters is not some general purpose that may have motivated the lawmakers but the means they chose to achieve that end. The fact that we can conceive of a better way of accomplishing what we think may have been the congressional purpose does not give us license to ignore the means Congress actually adopted.

Here Congress did not limit the benefits of the statute to residents of areas dominated by a subsistence economy. Instead, it wrote broadly, giving the statutory priority to all subsistence users residing in rural areas. To accept the state's contorted definition of rural would materially change the sweep of the statute, second-guessing the congressional policy judgment embodied in ANILCA. This we may not do.

The state's definition of rural would also lead to an inconsistency within the statute. ANILCA establishes not one but two levels of priority. The first, already discussed, gives subsistence users living in rural areas priority over other users. But the statute then goes on to consider the possibility of fish and wildlife shortages so severe that even the subsistence uses must be curtailed. In such a situation, certain subsistence users enjoy a priority over others. Which subsistence users receive this benefit? Those who can establish "customary and direct dependence upon the [fish and wildlife] populations as the mainstay of livelihood." 16 U.S.C. § 3114(1). Under the state's approach, this provision would be robbed of all meaning. Because the state's narrow interpretation of section 3113 limits the benefits of ANILCA's general priority to residents of areas where subsistence fishing is the mainstay of livelihood, anyone who qualifies for those benefits would also qualify for the more restrictive priority of section 3114(1). We cannot adopt a statutory interpretation that renders one portion of the statute redundant when there is another interpretation that avoids such redundancy. Congress quite clearly intended that section 3113 encompass a larger class of beneficiaries than section 3114(1). Giving the term rural its conventional meaning accomplishes this while the state's interpretation does not. Even if the state's interpretation were otherwise permissible, we would have to reject it in the name of internal statutory consistency.

The state nevertheless places heavy reliance on ANILCA's legislative history which, the state argues, overcomes all other considerations. But legislative history is not a panacea; it cannot overcome the structural and semantic problems discussed above. As the Supreme Court said with respect to this very statute, "[w]hen statutory language is plain, and nothing in the Act's structure or relationship to other statutes calls into question this plain meaning, that is ordinarily 'the end of the matter.'" Amoco Production Co. v. Village of Gambell, 107 S.Ct. 1396, 1408 (1987) (citation omitted). See also Bethesda Hosp. Ass'n v. Bowen, 108 S. Ct. 1255, 1258 (1988); United States v. Taylor, 108 S. Ct. 2413, 2423 (1988) (Scalia, J., concurring in part)(where meaning of a statute is clear, "there is no justification for resort to the legislative history"). Congress has used a simple term, one that is not reasonably susceptible to the interpretation the state advances. The legislative history, even if it were relevant, could not infuse a statutory term with a meaning to which it is not susceptible.

We conclude therefore that the state's redefinition of rural does not comport with section 3113. Alaska has failed to enforce the statute's subsistence priority; the state is not in compliance with ANILCA.

IV

We end as we began. This is a case involving a clash of lifestyles and a dispute over who gets to fish. Congress, using clear language, has resolved this dispute in favor of the Kenaitze who choose to pursue the traditional subsistence way of life by giving them priority in federal waters. The state has attempted to take away what Congress has given, adopting a creative redefinition of the word rural, a redefinition whose transparent purpose is to protect commercial and sport fishing interests.

The state is not required to regulate pursuant to ANILCA. If it does so, however, it is bound to implement the statute as Congress passed it, not as some of its citizens would prefer that it had been passed. If Alaska believes that the subsistence priority is too generous, or interferes too severely with commercial and recreational fishing, its elected federal representatives can attempt to amend the statute. The state may not achieve the same objective through indirection.[8]

[8] The state argues that article IV, section 4 of the Constitution, which "guarantee[s] to every State in this Union a Republican Form of Government," and the tenth amendment, which reserves to the states powers not delegated to the federal government, preclude a federal court from directing the state to amend its laws to make them consistent with ANILCA. Whether or not this proposition is correct, it has no relevance here. We do not purport to be directing the state to amend its laws; it is free to eschew any further entanglement with the federal government by advising the Department of the Interior that it is withdrawing from its role in administering ANILCA.

We reverse the judgment of the district court and remand for entry of a preliminary injunction.[9]

Russians arrived and Russian settlements were established near the end of the eighteenth century, introducing a trade in furs. American traders replaced the Russians after 1867. Commercial salmon fishing by Americans began in 1880 with a cannery being built at Kasilof. Reed, supra, at 14-15 (1985).

The traditional life appears to have been relatively unchanged when it was surveyed in 1931-1934 by an anthropologist, Cornelius Osgood. He wrote:

> Five kinds of salmon appear in the Tanaina area–humpbacks, dogs, silvers, reds, and kings. The humpbacks swim every place in the bays and creeks during their season around Seldovia. At Kenai they make their main run during July when they go far up the rivers. Humpback salmon appear in the Upper Inlet but they are said to be only occasional visitors around Tyonek and there are none at Iliamna. The same information is true for dog salmon, except that they apparently do not go so far up the rivers, a few appearing around Tyonek in late July. The silver salmon run late in the season. They occur in all areas except Iliamna and are noted for the fact that they travel a long way up the rivers. The most important of all, especially since they come at a time when food is scarce, are the red and king salmon, which the Tanaina look for in May. The king salmon do not appear in Kachemak Bay and at Iliamna, however. At Iliamna, red salmon supply the principal summer food.

The ordinary native method of catching salmon is to construct a weir by damming a creek or small river with a construction of logs and debris, set diagonally upstream from each side toward a small opening in the center through which the fish are force to pass, thus entering a V-shaped trap of logs about ten feet on a side, from which they cannot extricate themselves. One man stands in the trap and with a small dip-net takes out two or three fish at a time, which another man kills with a club. A third man puts a spruce root line through their gills (or throws them into a boat) and brings them ashore. Sometimes, instead of the simple fish weir, the Indians make a basket trap of long alders with a conical entrance which they place at the opening of the dam. They remove the fish from a door in the same manner as described above. The Kachemak Bay Tanaina do not use a gaff-hook in fishing, but at Kenai the latter instrument serves for catching crabs.

The Tanaina also catch fish by the use of a drag-net made of alder poles tied together with spruce root line. Men take hold of each end, and with another man in the middle, they push the fish into shallow water, where they kill them with wooden clubs. Sometimes the fish are pushed on to flats where they strand at low tide. When all the fish have been taken ashore, an old man counts and divides > them equally. The women clean the fish, the boys wash them, and old men hang them up to dry.

After World War II, homesteading increased on the Kenai Peninsula. The development of oil fields led to substantial growth after 1957. Reed, supra, at 17. In 1951 a highway was completed linking the Kenai Peninsula to Anchorage and leading to a substantial increase in tourism. In economic terms commercial fishing ranks first; oil production, second; tourism, third. Id. at 18.

By 1976 it was observed that in rural Alaska a shift had occurred from an economy of subsistence fishing and hunting, rounded out by work for cash, to a cash economy, rounded out by subsistence activities. The shift varied greatly from village to village. Indeed the mix of cash and subsistence uses varied according to four factors: the season; the number of persons working in the family; the availability of cash-paying jobs; and the availability of subsistence resources. Nancy Yaw Davis, Steps Toward Understanding Rapid Culture Change in Native Rural Alaska. Federal-State Land Use Planning Commission for Alaska: Commission Study No. 16 23 (1976).

There are now 30 different occupations which have been identified as providing cash incomes to Natives. Swan, supra, 7. About 9 percent of persons on the Tribe's voting roll hold commercial fishing permits. Id. at 6.

The number of salmon caught for subsistence has been very small in relation to commercial harvesting. For example in 1980 in which a very high number of subsistence permits (1,219) were issued, the total salmon caught by subsistence users was 14,279. The salmon commercially harvested were 4,128,130. Swan, supra, Table I after p.6. From 1971 to 1980, commercial, sport and subsistence user groups on the Cook Inlet caught 4 million salmon in even years, and in the odd years 3.8 million. Id at II-1. Commercial fishermen caught 95 percent of the salmon and sports fishermen were the second largest harvesters of salmon. Id. at II-2. One study of the Upper Cook Inlet found that the percentage of the salmon harvest attributable to subsistence fishermen constituted .008 percent in 1977, .07 percent in 1978, .47 percent in 1979, and .33 percent in 1980. Stephen Braund, Cook Inlet Subsistence Salmon Fishery 33 (1982).

As this review indicates, I have taken a look – the kind of preliminary look necessary to consider a preliminary injunction – at facts that appear not to be in dispute. Three things stand out: First, there was a long tradition of the subsistence uses of salmon by the Tribe. Second, there has been considerable economic and social change on the Kenai Peninsula. Third, the subsistence uses are very small compared with the salmon taken by commercial and sports fishermen. These patterns point in different directions as to what good regulation of subsistence uses on the Kenai Peninsula would require. As a court of appeals we are certainly not in a position to decide.

What we are in a position to decide is what the Conservation Act requires. The Conservation Act could be interpreted as freeing Alaska to do what it likes if the laws it first enacted met the requirements of 16 U.S.C. § 3115(d). But the statute itself provides that if the Alaska laws "are repealed" they no longer supersede the federal law governing state responsibility. Id. The change in Alaska Legislation in May 1986 may fairly be interpreted as a repeal of the laws that had been found by the Secretary to be in compliance with the Conservation Act.

If the statute was read in the most literal way possible, Alaska would have lost its only chance to take responsibility – it would have repealed the laws that were satisfactory. It would have no opportunity to reenact others. But we think such a wooden reading of the Conservation Act would be contrary to the basic thrust of the legislation. If Alaska is not in conformity with the Conservation Act, it may again get itself within the federal requirements.

Alaska supposes that it can get into conformity by a certification by the Secretary. The Secretary takes the same position, in an amicus brief arguing that the court should defer to his certification. But there is simply no provision in the statute for the Secretary assuming this role. The Secretary had one directive to carry out under section 3115(d), and he did so. After that his role is to monitor the provisions of the state and report to Congress. 16 U.S.C. § 3116.

We are directed by Section 3117 to enforce a federal statute. There is no basis for us to defer either to the Secretary or the state. Congress provided in explicit terms what is to be given priority. It is "non-wasteful subsistence uses," 16 U.S.C. § 3114, which are "the customary and traditional uses" of "rural Alaska residents." 16 U.S.C. § 3113. The uses of residents are not the uses of rural areas or communities or groups. At the time the statute was enacted it was clear that traditional subsistence uses varied from village to village, season to season, family to family. Davis, supra at 23. The statute is directed to the protection of individuals who individually followed the traditional ways.

The state may not subtract from this federal statute. It has done so and so must be enjoined. The Tribe is entitled to an injunction providing that subsistence uses of fish by members of the Tribe shall be given a priority by the state over all other uses so far as necessary as to preserve the subsistence uses of such users. 16 U.S.C. § 3114.

I also concur in parts 1, 2, and 4 of the opinion of the court.

APPENDIX B

IN THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT

FOR THE DISTRICT OF ALASKA

KENAITZE INDIAN TRIBE, Plaintiff, vs. STATE OF ALASKA, Defendant.	No. A86-367 Civil ORDER (Filed July 9, 1987)

Preliminary Injunction Denied;
Defendant's Motion to Dismiss Denied;
Plaintiff's Motion for Summary Judgment Denied;
Defendant's Motion for Partial Summary Judgment Granted

The Court now has under consideration Plaintiff's motion for a preliminary injunction. As a result of status conferences held with counsel subsequent to oral argument on Plaintiff's motion for preliminary injunction, and by agreement of counsel as reflected in the Court's order of April 16, 1987, the Court has withheld its decision on the motion for preliminary injunction and has proceeded with consideration of Plaintiff's motion for summary judgment and Defendant's motion to dismiss or for summary judgment. Oral argument as to the latter motions has been waived inasmuch as the case was thoroughly argued as to the merits in conjunction with argument of the motion for preliminary injunction.

All of the foregoing motions have as their focal point the provisions of the Alaska National Interest Lands Conservation Act ("ANILCA"). Thus it will be useful as a preliminary to deciding the motions before the Court to set out a history of the development of ANILCA and, in particular, the history of that act as it affects the taking of fish for food purposes by rural Alaska residents who would engage in a subsistence lifestyle.

History of ANILCA and Alaska Subsistence Laws

In 1973, Congress began considering what ultimately became the Alaska National Interest Lands Conservation Act. ANILCA became law on December 2, 1980, as Pub. L. No. 96-487, 16 U.S.C. §§ 3101-3233[1] (hereinafter the section numbers of title 16, United States Code, will be used for references to ANILCA).

[1] The origins of ANILCA date back to 1971 when Congress passed the Alaska Native Claims Settlement Act which provided the Secretary of the Interior the opportunity to designate new natural, cultural, recreational, and wildlife areas. Section 17(d)(2) of the act authorized the Secretary to withdraw 80 million acres of land during the next two years to be studied for possible additions to the National Park, National Wildlife Refuge, National Wild and Scenic Rivers, and National Forest System. The deadline for the Secretary's withdrawal action was December 18, 1973. On December 17, 1973, the legislative proposals resulting from these "d-2" studies were submitted to Congress. Following receipt of these proposals, Congress had five years (until December 17, 1978) within which to act. Congress did not so act.

The overall purpose of ANILCA is found in 16 U.S.C. § 1301. ANILCA is aimed at preserving "nationally significant natural, scenic, historic, archeological, geological, scientific, wilderness, cultural, recreational, and wildlife values" in "certain lands and waters in the State of

In order to prevent the withdrawal status of the lands which were included in the proposed legislation from terminating on December 17, 1978, the Secretary, on November 16, 1978, exercised his authority under section 204(e) of the Federal Land Policy and Management Act (FLPMA) to withdraw 105 million acres of federal land in Alaska for a three-year period expiring on November 19, 1981. The Secretary of Agriculture withdrew an additional 11 million acres under section 204(b) of the FLPMA for a two-year period.

On December 1, 1978, the President withdrew by proclamation over 55 million acres of Alaska land and designated them as national monuments to be administered by the National Park Service, the U.S. Fish & Wildlife Service, and the U.S. Forest Service.

The Secretary of the Interior, on February 12, 1980, withdrew 40 million acres of land for a period of 20 years under the authority of the FLPMA to extend the three-year withdrawals that were scheduled to expire in November, 1981.

On December 2, 1980, the Alaska National Interest Lands Conservation Act was signed by the President as Pub. L. No. 96-487. Since then, three public laws have been passed amending the origianl legislation: Pub. L. No. 97-394, Pub. L. 468, and Pub. L. No. 98-620.

The entire legislative history of ANILCA has been assembled by the Bureau of Land Management in 41 volumes entitled "Public Law 96-487, Alaska National Interest Lands Conservation Act". See 1980 U.S. Code Cong. & Admin. News (page 5070) for ANILCA's legislative history.

Alaska". 16 U.S.C. § 3101(a). As regards the subsistence way of life for Alaska residents, ANILCA provides:

> It is further the intent and purpose of this Act consistent with management of fish and wildlife in accordance with recognized scientific principles and the purposes for which each conservation system unit is established, designated, or expanded by or pursuant to this Act, to provide the opportunity for rural residents engaged in a subsistence way of life to continue to do so.

16 U.S.C. § 3101(c) (emphasis supplied).

Subchapter II of ANILCA, Sections 3111 through 3126, pertains to subsistence management and use of "public lands" in Alaska.[2] Subchapter II contains a statement of congressional policy which reiterates exactly the above-quoted purpose: the preservation and perpetuation of the subsistence lifestyle for "rural residents" of Alaska. 16 U.S.C. § 3112(1). Subchapter II of ANILCA further declares it to be the policy of Congress that "nonwasteful subsistence uses of fish and wildlife . . . shall be the priority consumptive uses of all such resources on the public lands of Alaska. . . ." 16 U.S.C. § 3112(2).

The term "subsistence uses" is defined by ANILCA at 16 U.S.C. § 3113 as:

[2] The term "public lands" is defined by 16 U.S.C. § 3102(3). With certain exceptions, "public lands" are lands situated in Alaska, the title to which is in the United States after December 2, 1980. 16 U.S.C. § 3102(2) and (3). Since the State of Alaska has title to and manages considerable public land in its own right, "public lands" of the United States are herein referred to as "federal lands".

> [T]he customary and traditional uses by rural Alaska residents of wild, renewable resources for direct personal or family consumption as food, shelter, fuel, clothing, tools, or transportation; for the making and selling of handicraft articles out of nonedible byproducts of fish and wildlife resources taken for personal or family consumption; for barter, or sharing for personal or family consumption; and for customary trade.

The primary operative provision of ANILCA pertinent to this case is that which provides a "preference for subsistence uses" as follows:

> Except as otherwise provided in this Act and other Federal laws, the taking on public lands of fish and wildlife for nonwasteful subsistence uses shall be accorded priority over the taking on such lands of fish and wildlife for other purposes. Whenever it is necessary to restrict the taking of populations of fish and wildlife on such lands for subsistence uses in order to protect the continued viability of such populations, or to continue such uses, such priority shall be implemented through appropriate limitations based on the application of the following criteria:
> (1) customary and direct dependence upon the populations as the mainstay of livelihood;
> (2) local residency; and
> (3) the availability of alternative resources.

16 U.S.C. § 3114 (emphasis supplied).

Section 3115 of ANILCA sets out the basic federal structure for implementation of section 3114 on federal lands within the State of Alaska. Prior to ANILCA, management of fish and wildlife on federal lands in the State of Alaska had been carried out by the State of Alaska through its Department of Fish and Game. But for the provision of 16 U.S.C. § 3115(d), under ANILCA management of fish and game on federal lands in the State of Alaska would have been given over to the Secretary of the Department of the Interior. The latter section provides in pertinent part:

> The Secretary shall not implement subsections (a), (b), and (c) of this section if within one year from December 2, 1980, the State enacts and implements laws of general applicability which are consistent with, and which provide for the definition, preference, and participation specified in, sections 3113, 3114, and 3115 of this title, such laws, unless and until repealed, shall supersede such sections insofar as such sections govern State responsibility pursuant to this subchapter for the taking of fish and wildlife on the public lands for subsistence uses. Laws establishing a system of local advisory committees and regional advisory councils consistent with this section shall provide that the State rulemaking authority shall consider the advice and recommendations of the regional councils concerning the taking of fish and wildlife populations on public lands within their respective regions for subsistence uses.

Prior to the enactment of ANILCA, the State of Alaska had commenced its efforts to recognize the subsistence lifestyle and to continue management of fish and wildlife on federal lands under a program permitting subsistence use. The Alaska statute which provided the foundation for the State's subsistence program was put in place by the Alaska Legislature in 1978. Ch. 151 SLA 1978; AS 16.05.251, -.255, -.257, and -.940(23) (1978). The latter act contained a definition of "subsistence uses" which was modeled on the definition of that term contained in draft ANILCA legislation then pending before the United States House of Representatives.[3] See AS 16.05.940(23) (1978).

The Alaska subsistence statute made provision for the adoption of regulations. AS 16.05.251(b) and -.257 (1978). In late 1980, the Board of Fisheries of the State of Alaska made findings and adopted certain policies as regards protection of customary and traditional subsistence fishing. In identifying characteristics associated with subsistence fishing, the Board of Fisheries determined to consider "a use pattern established by an identified community, sub-community, or group having preponderant concentrations of persons showing past use." Plaintiff's Exhibit 10. In conjunction with identifying subsistence characteristics, the Board of fisheries found that: "Customary and Traditional uses continue to be nutritionally, economically, and socially important, particularly in the non-road-connected villages of Cook Inlet." Id. Except by this indirect reference to villages off the road network, the board's findings and itemization of characteristics did not expressly deal with the concept of "rural" areas of residents. These criteria ultimately came to be incorporated into the Alaska Administrative Code of Regulations as 5 AAC 01.597 (repealed May 11, 1985).[4]

[3] S. Rep. No. 96-413, 96th Cong., 2d Sess. 268, reprinted in 1980 U.S. Code Cong. & Admin. News 5070, 5212. This legislative history further indicates that the definition of "subsistence uses" which ultimately became section 3113 of ANILCA was adopted from the definition of that term contained in section 15, chapter 151, Session Laws of Alaska (1978).

[4] 5 AAC § 01.597 can be found in Madison v. Alaska Department of Fish & Game, 696 P.2d 168, 172 n.8 (Alaska 1985).

Based upon the foregoing, the Board of Fisheries in 1981 authorized a subsistence fishery for Cook Inlet salmon at English Bay, Port Graham, and Tyonek where customary and traditional uses of this resource were found to exist. The Board expressly rejected a subsistence fishery for Plaintiffs. In the early 1980's (it is now otherwise as discussed in a succeeding section of this order), there was no provision for Plaintiffs to employ gill net fishing since this method of taking fish did not qualify as either commercial or sport fishing due to statutory and regulatory characteristics of those modes of fishing. Litigation followed and preliminary injunctions from the court of the State of Alaska resulted in personal use gill net fisheries in the Cook Inlet area. Madison v. Alaska Department of Fish & Game, 696 P.2d 168, 173 (Alaska 1985).

In 1982, the Alaska Boards of Fisheries and Game jointly adopted regulations for the protection of subsistence uses. 5 AAC 99.010 (1982). By this regulation, customary and traditional subsistence uses were for the first time expressly associated with "rural Alaska residents" and were to be identified by reference to eight characteristics which plainly have their origins in the ten criteria originally employed by the Board of Fisheries.

In due course, the State of Alaska transmitted to the Department of the Interior its proposed subsistence management and use program for review by the Secretary of the Department of the Interior (hereinafter the "Secretary") under 16 U.S.C. § 3115(d). By letter dated May 14, 1982, the Secretary advised the Governor of the State of Alaska that[5]:

> Based upon our review of [the State's] submission, material transmitted to us by the State on December 2 and 23, 1981, and other relevant information, we have determined that the State's program will be in compliance with Sections 803, 804 and 805 of ANILCA [16 U.S.C. §§ 3113, 3114, and 3115] as of June 2, 1982. As a result of this certification of compliance, the State retains its traditional role in the regulation of fish and wildlife resources on the public lands in Alaska.

Meanwhile, Madison was working its way through the courts of Alaska. The Madison plaintiffs challenged the board's application of its regulations but were unsuccessful in the superior court. In February of 1985, the Alaska Supreme Court held that under then-operative Alaska statutes, subsistence uses were open to both urban and rural residents alike. Id. at 176. The Alaska Supreme Court found that the board's regulations which excluded urban subsistence applicants such as Madison were inconsistent with the intent of the 1978 state subsistence act.

As a consequence of Madison, on September 23, 1985, the Secretary advised the Governor of the State of Alaska that[6]:

> [T]he Department of the Interior finds it necessary to advise you formally that the State subsistence program is no longer in compliance with the requirements of ANILCA as specified in Title VIII [16 U.S.C. § 3111, et seq.].

[5] Defendant's Memorandum in Support of Motion to Dismiss, Attachment No. 1.

Commenting upon Madison, the Secretary further advised:

> This ruling held that under the State statute, the subsistence preference must be extended to both "rural" and "urban" subsistence users. Because section 803 [16 U.S.C. § 3113] of ANILCA limits the subsistence preference to "rural Alaska residents," the Madison decision raised questions as to the continuing eligibility of the State to manage subsistence on public lands in Alaska under section 805(d) [16 U.S.C. § 3115(d)] of ANILCA.

The letter continues by discussing earlier communications to the State and then goes on to inform the Governor that:

> [T]he absence of legislative action this year to amend the State subsistence statute to conform to ANILCA has confirmed our preliminary determination that the State is no longer in compliance with the requirements of section 805(d) [16 U.S.C. § 3115(d)].
> You are hereby advised that the State has until June 1, 1986, to revise its subsistence program to bring it back into compliance with the requirements of sections 803, 804 and 805 [16 U.S.C. §§ 3113, 3114, and 3115(d)] of ANILCA. Compliance will require that the subsistence preference be limited to those rural Alaska residents who customarily and traditionally make use of subsistence resources. If the State has not conformed its subsistence program to the requirements of ANILCA by that date, the Department will be obliged to discharge its obligations pursuant to section 805 [16 U.S.C. § 3115(a) through 3115(c)]. As we noted to the State Boards of Fisheries and Game in 1982, there are various ways to comply with the requirements of section 805; the regime in force when the Madison decision was handed down represented one possible approach.

In response to the foregoing, the Alaska Legislature in 1986 adopted new legislation on the subject of subsistence. Ch. 52, SLA 1986. This act effected multiple amendments to Title 16 of the Alaska Statutes which codifies Alaska's fish and game laws. The main operative provision of chapter 52 is codified as AS 16.05.258, which in pertinent part provides:

> (a) The Board of Fisheries and the Board of Game shall identify the fish stocks and game populations, or portions of stocks and populations, that are customarily and traditionally used for subsistence in each rural area identified by the boards.

AS 16.05.258(c) provides for the adoption of regulations which accord "a preference over other consumptive uses" for subsistence uses of fish stocks. This subsection also sets out the criteria for restricting subsistence uses when necessary to assure sustained yields.

Chapter 52 also embodied a definition of "rural area"[7]:

> "[R]ural area" means a community or area of the state in which the noncommercial, customary, and traditional use of fish or game for personal or family consumption is a principal characteristic of the economy of the community or area.

Chapter 52 also contains a definition of "subsistence fishing" and "subsistence uses"[8]:

> "[S]ubsistence fishing" means the taking of, fishing for, or possession of fish, shellfish, or other fisheries > resources by a resident domiciled in a rural area of the state for subsistence uses with gill net, seine, fish wheel, long line, or other means defined by the Board of Fisheries;

>
> "[S]ubsistence uses" means the noncommercial, customary and traditional uses of wild, renewable resources by a resident domiciled in a rural area of the state for direct personal or family consumption as food, shelter, fuel, clothing, tools, or transportation, for the making and selling of handicraft articles out of nonedible by-products of fish and wildlife resources taken for personal or family consumption, and for the customary trade, barter, or sharing for personal or family consumption; in this paragraph, "family" means persons related by blood, marriage, or adoption, and a person living in the household on a permanent basis. . . .

By letter dated November 7, 1986, the Secretary advised the Governor of Alaska that[9]:

> I am therefore pleased to inform you that we have determined that the State's subsistence program is once again in full compliance with sections 803, 804 and 805 of ANILCA. The State as a result will continue in its traditional role in the regulation and management of subsistence uses of fish and wildlife on the public lands in Alaska.

Motion to Dismiss/Standing

Although the Court has already given full consideration to Plaintiff's motion for preliminary injunction at this point, Defendant's contention that Plaintiff lacks standing to raise the substantive questions which are before the Court should logically be ruled upon first. Defendant contends that Plaintiff has not demonstrated through its complaint that an injury has occurred. In support of this contention, Defendant argues at length that: "[e]xtensive hunting and fishing opportunities are available to all residents of the Kenai Peninsula, including the members of Plaintiff Kenaitze Indian Tribe." Defendant's Memorandum in Support of Motion to Dismiss, at 4.

Plaintiff's complaint alleges that the Kenaitze Indian Tribe is made up of members who have resided principally on the Kenai Peninsula of Alaska since before the Russian occupation of Alaska. The Kenaitze people are alleged to have depended upon natural resources such as fish for their livelihood and subsistence. The complaint alleges (and the claim is admitted by Defendant as to some but not all of the Kenaitze people) that the Kenaitze have consistently harvested salmon near their homes, that the knowledge of the means of harvesting, handling, preparing, preserving, and storing salmon has been passed down through the generations, and that harvested salmon continues to be shared among family and tribal members. It is claimed that the Kenaitze are rural Alaskans and that their taking of natural resources from in and around Cook Inlet is for subsistence purposes which are entitled to priority under ANILCA. Complaint, para. XVII. Plaintiff's complaint alleges as its cause of action the refusal of the State of Alaska to recognize the priority to which the Kenaitze members' taking of salmon is allegedly entitled under ANILCA. Complaint, para. XVIII. Plaintiff contends that, to the extent the 1986

Alaska subsistence statute cannot be read to protect Kenaitze members' salmon fishing for subsistence uses, the statute is inconsistent with ANILCA. Complaint, para. XIX.

The general thrust of Defendant's answer is a denial that natural resources used by Kenaitze members today are "subsistence uses" as that term is defined in ANILCA. Answer, para. 10. However, as set out above, the primary thrust of Defendant's standing argument is the assertion that Plaintiff's members are not injured because of the numerous fishing opportunities available to them under Alaska law.

Defendant's argument misses the mark. Plaintiff's complaint alleges that its members are subsistence users of fish stocks, and that as such they are entitled to priority over other consumers of fish. Plaintiff contends that its members have been denied such priority as a result of Defendant's implementation of its subsistence statute. Assuming that Plaintiff is able to establish its foregoing contentions, it members will most certainly have been denied the priority that Congress intended for subsistence users of Kenai Peninsula fish stocks. Defendant's argument misses the thrust of Plaintiff's contention in that all of the opportunities which Plaintiff's members have available to them in common and on an equal footing with other users of fish stocks patently fail to afford Plaintiff's members, if they are subsistence users, "priority over the taking . . . of fish . . . for other purposes." 16 U.S.C. § 3114. Equal access is simply not the same as priority. Denial of the statutory priority, if established, is certainly an injury in fact to Plaintiff's members. Association of Data Processing Service Organizations, Inc. v. Camp, 397 U.S. 150, 153-54 (1970); Heller v. Bushey, 759 F.2d 1371, 1373 (9th Cir. 1985).

Additionally, the taking of fish for subsistence purposes by those who have a tradition of such a lifestyle is within the zone of interests protected by ANILCA. Barlow v. Collins, 397 U.S. 159, 165-66 (1970). Indeed, the protection of subsistence uses by rural Alaskans is the fundamental purpose of those provisions of ANILCA hereinabove discussed.

It should be pointed out that Plaintiff's standing to sue is not dependent upon any racial or tribal consideration. The Court would have the same view of this matter if Plaintiff were an association of persons of any racial background (or of unknown racial background) whose only common characteristics were residence in a rural part of Alaska and the customary and traditional use of wild renewable resources for food. It is such persons who are entitled to priority access to fish for subsistence uses. 16 U.S.C. §§ 3113 and 3114.

That such an entity as an association of rural subsistence users may sue under ANILCA is expressly recognized wherein that Act provides:

> Local residents and other persons and organizations aggrieved by a failure of the State or the Federal Government to provide for the priority for subsistence uses set forth in section 3114 of this title (or with respect to the State as set forth in a State law of general applicability if the State has fulrilled the requirements of section 3115(d) of this title) may- . . . file a civil action in the United States District Court for the District of Alaska to require such actions to be taken as are necessary to provide for the priority.

16 U.S.C. § 3117(a) (emphasis supplied).

Clearly Plaintiff is such an "organization" allegedly aggrieved by a failure of the state to provide the section 3114 priority for subsistence uses. Defendant's motion to dismiss for lack of standing is denied.

Motion for Preliminary Injunction

The judicial enforcement provisions of ANILCA provide that:

> The court may grant preliminary injunctive relief in any civil action if the granting of such relief is appropriate under the facts upon which the action is based. No order granting preliminary relief shall be issued until after an opportunity for hearing.

16 U.S.C. § 3117.

A hearing was requested and has been held as regards Plaintiff's motion.

The criteria for considering a motion for preliminary injunction are not here in dispute. The Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals has recently summarized the tests for granting preliminary injunctions as follows:

> The traditional equitable criteria for granting preliminary injunctive relief are (1) a strong likelihood of success on the merits, (2) the possibility of irreparable injury to plaintiff if the preliminary relief is not granted, (3) a balance of hardships favoring the plaintiff, and (4) advancement of the public interest (in certain cases). Sierra Club v. Hathaway, 579 F.2d 1162, 1167 (9th Cir. 1978). "The moving party may meet its burden by demonstrating either (1) a combination of probable success on the merits and the possibility of irreparable injury or (2) that serious questions are raised and the balance of hardships tips sharply in its favor." Los Angeles Memorial Coliseum Commission v. National Football League, 634 F.2d 1197, 1201 (9th Cir. 1980).

Dollar Rent A Car of Washington v. Travelers Indemnity, 774 F.2d 1371, 1374-75 (9th Cir 1985).

The Court applied the foregoing authorities and criteria in considering Plaintiff's motion for preliminary injunction. In so doing, the Court concluded that Plaintiff was not just unlikely to prevail on the merits of its claim but also that the Defendant was entitled to judgment as a matter of law as to the issue briefed and argued by the parties on motion for preliminary injunction. This issue was Plaintiff's contention that the definition of "rural area" contained in the 1986 Alaska subsistence statute was inconsistent with ANILCA. As a consequence, and as explained at the outset, the Court held status conferences with counsel which resulted in an agreement that the Court should proceed with the parties' cross-motions for summary judgment. Accordingly, and because of the Court's reasons and conclusions hereinafter set out as regards the motions for summary judgment, Plaintiff's motion for a preliminary injunction must be denied because, as a matter of law, Defendant is entitled to prevail on the issues raised by the motion for preliminary injunction and cross-motions for summary judgment.

As has been discussed in the Court's previous procedural order of April 16, 1987, the Court and counsel have had discussions concerning the nature and extent of Plaintiff's complaint. Initially, there was some thought on the part of the Court that Plaintiff's complaint challenged only the State subsistence statute and its compatibility with federal law. Oral argument on the motion for preliminary injunction, and a more thorough analysis of Plaintiff's complaint, as well as the other arguments which counsel have presented in writing, have caused the Court to conclude that Plaintiff's complaint, when liberally construed, is sufficient to comprehend not only the issue of consistency between federal and state subsistence laws, but also the actual application of the State's subsistence program under ch. 52, SLA 1986, and the regulations promulgated under that statute as to Plaintiff's members. The motion for preliminary injunction and the cross-motions for summary judgment address only the former issue. The latter issue involves, among other things, an extremely complex factual situation and, as discussed at the conclusion of this order, presupposes a resolution of the first issue which the Court now takes up.

Cross-Motions for Summary Judgment

By the provisions of section 3115(d) of ANILCA, Congress made provision for a delegation of subsistence management as to federal lands in the State of Alaska. As fully set out above, section 3115(d) authorized the State of Alaska to continue the role which it had enjoyed as manager of fish and game resources in the State of Alaska if:

> [T]he state enacts and implements laws of general applicability which are consistent with, and which provide for the definition, preference, and participation specified in sections 3113, 3114, and 3115 of this title. . . .

By its motion for summary judgment, Plaintiff does not argue that the Alaska subsistence law fails to provide for the subsistence "preference" required by section 3114 of ANILCA, nor does Plaintiff contend that the State of Alaska has failed to provide for the "participation" required by section 3115(a).[10] Rather, Plaintiff's claim centers upon the definition of subsistence uses. Plaintiff's specific contention on motion for summary judgment (as well as on motion for preliminary injunction) is that the State of Alaska subsistence statute definition of "rural area" is inconsistent with section 3113 of ANILCA. By cross-motion for summary judgment, the State of Alaska urges the appropriateness of its definition of "rural area" under ANILCA.

The parties are in agreement that resolution of the foregoing issue does not involve disputed facts, and that it may be resolved as a legal proposition. The Court has concluded that there are no genuine issues of material fact necessary to resolution of the foregoing issue and that the Defendant is entitled to judgment on this issue as a matter of law. Rule 56(c), Federal Rules of Civil Procedure.

In furtherance of the ANILCA requirement that Alaska law contain a definition consistent with section 3113, the Alaska Legislature adopted AS 16.05.940(30). This definition of "subsistence uses" is set forth at pages 12-13, above. Subsection 30 defines "subsistence uses" to [10] Alaska's subsistence law is on its face a law of general application. AS 16.05 applies without qualification to the taking of fish and game throughout the State of Alaska. Plaintiff does not argue otherwise.

mean: "customary and traditional uses of . . . renewable resources by a resident domiciled in a rural area of the state for direct personal or family consumption. . . ."

Section 3113 of ANILCA defines "subsistence uses" to mean "the customary and traditional uses by rural Alaska residents of . . . renewable resources. . . ."

The words employed by Congress and by the Alaska Legislature are plain. The two statutes in substance say the same thing. There is no obvious inconsistency of definition between the two statutes.

The term "rural" may itself be lacking in precision. However, this is the term which Congress chose to use. In defining "subsistence uses", the Alaska Legislature employed the same term. The Court does not perceive any meaningful difference between the phrase "rural Alaska residents" and "resident domiciled in a rural area". AS 16.05.940(30) and 16 U.S.C. § 3113. The Court concludes that the Alaska subsistence statute meets the requirement of ANILCA section 3115(d) that it contain a definition of subsistence uses consistent with ANILCA.

However, the specific thrust of Plaintiff's argument is that the Alaska definition of "rural area" (AS 16.05.940(25)) takes the Alaska subsistence law out of compliance – out of consistency – with ANILCA. While it is the Court's view that the congressional requirement of consistency with ANILCA (section 3115(d)) is on its face a term of sufficient breadth to afford the State of Alaska considerable latitude in the fashioning of a subsistence program of general application in Alaska, the Plaintiff's argument cannot be dismissed out of hand for two reasons. Firstly, the issue of subsistence hunting and fishing rights in Alaska is one of immense importance for the people of the State of Alaska. As is suggested by the lengthy history of this matter, what the Court will decide here impacts not just Plaintiff's members and Defendant, but all subsistence users of fish and game, all sport fishermen and hunters, and many commercial fishermen of the State of Alaska. Secondly, the Court must recognize the theoretical possibility that the State could have defined terms important to subsistence fishing in such a fashion as to substantially deprive the Plaintiff's members of their statutory "priority" under ANILCA, section 3114, despite the facial consistency which exists as between the state and federal subsistence laws insofar as the "definition, preference, and participation" provisions contained in them.

ANILCA does not contain a definition of the term "rural". AS 16.05.940(25) defines "rural area" as:

> "[A] community or area of the state in which the noncommercial, customary, and traditional use of fish or game for personal or family consumption is a principal characteristic of the economy of the community or area. . . .

In defining "rural area", the State has employed the very same operative terms as the ANILCA definition of "subsistence uses". 16 U.S.C. § 3113. Each makes reference to customary and traditional uses of fish or game for personal or family consumption; each makes reference to non commercial uses of such resources. By so doing, the State has in substance defined "rural area" as those parts of the State of Alaska where subsistence uses are carried on by the people.

While the State's definition of "rural area" may lack some certainty of application in that it cannot be applied directly to a map so as to locate subsistence areas, the Court sees no conflict or inconsistency between AS 16.05.940(25) and section 3113 of ANILCA. Likewise, and because the terms used by the state statute are those used in the federal statute, there is no conflict or inconsistency between the state statute and the congressional policy statement for the subsistence portions of ANILCA contained in 16 U.S.C. § 3112. Here also, Congress has expressed the intent that the subsistence lifestyle be available to "rural residents". 16 U.S.C. § 3112(1).

By section 3116 of ANILCA, Congress has required that:

> The Secretary shall monitor the provisions by the State of the subsistence preference set forth in section 3114 of this title and shall advise the State and [specified house and senate committees] annually and at such other times as he deems necessary of his views on the effectiveness of the implementation of this subchapter including the State's provision of such preference, any exercise of his closure or other administrative authority to protect subsistence resources or uses, the views of the State, and any other recommendations he may have.

As detailed hereinabove, the Secretary, in furtherance of the foregoing and as a result of the Alaska Supreme Court decision in Madison, advised the State on September 23, 1985, that "the State subsistence program is no longer in compliance with the requirements of ANILCA. . . ." See page 10, above. Subsequently, the State of Alaska amended its fish and game laws so as to restrict the availability of subsistence uses to rural Alaska. The Secretary then advised the Governor of the State of Alaska that it was "once again in full compliance with . . . ANILCA." See page 13, above.

By the foregoing, the Department of the Interior has unequivocally expressed its favorable evaluation of the State's compliance with ANILCA. The Court takes note of the fact that this evaluation was given in the very same context which gives rise to this litigation. The Department of the Interior expressed disapproval of the State's subsistence program when it was ordered expanded to include urban residents of the State by the Alaska Supreme Court. As soon as the Alaska Legislature amended the subsistence statute so as to again restrict its operation to rural Alaska, the Department of the Interior expressed its approval of the State's subsistence program.

Since the Secretary is under a direct congressional mandate to monitor and to advise the State as regards its implementation of the subsistence portions of ANILCA, the Court owes deference to the Secretary's views on this subject. Kunaknana v. Clark, No. A83-337 (D. Alaska Dec. 20, 1983), aff'd, 742 F.2d 1145 (9th Cir. 1984).[11] [11] Agency interpretations of a statute are entitled to great deference and should be upheld so long as they are reasonable. Western Pioneer, Inc. v. United States, 709 F.2d 1331, 1335 (9th Cir. 1983); United States v. Boyden, 695 F.2d 685, 688 (9th Cir. 1983).

Kunaknana, 742 F.2d at 1150. Particularly pertinent to the issue at hand is the Ninth Circuit's quotation in Kunaknana from Western Pioneer:

The Secretary's view that the current Alaska subsistence law is consistent with ANILCA reassures this Court that its independent view of the consistency between these two statutes is the correct one.

Because of the absence of a congressional definition of the term "rural", the Court has reviewed the substantial legislative history on the subsistence portions of ANILCA upon which the parties rely and advance extensive argument. Plaintiff argues that rural areas should be defined by reference to numbers of people – population density. Plaintiff urges in this regard that the State of Alaska erred in defining "rural area" in terms of communities or areas of the state where the subsistence lifestyle "is a principal characteristic of the economy." AS 16.05.940(25). The legislative history of ANILCA is particularly helpful in evaluating these arguments of the Plaintiff.

As to Plaintiff's first contention – that the rural nature of an area be defined in terms of its population – there is little or no support in the legislative history. As to the second contention – that rural areas should not be defined in terms of the prevalence of subsistence uses or

> Our task then, is not to interpret the statutes as we think best, but rather to inquire whether the [agency's] construction was "sufficiently reasonable" to be accepted. "To satisfy the standard it is not necessary for a court to find that the agency's construction was the only reasonable one or even the reading the court would have reached if the question initially had arisen in a judicial proceeding." a characterization of the economy of the area – the legislative history suggests just the opposite.

Both of these matters are best addressed in a single passage which appears in Senate Report No. 96-413, 96th Cong., 2d Sess. 233, reprinted in 1980 U.S. Code Cong & Admin. News 5070, 5177, where we read the following:

> Although many residents of cities such as Ketchikan, Juneau, Anchorage, and Fairbanks harvest renewable resources from the public lands for personal or family consumption, by its very nature a "subsistence use" is something done only by Native and non-Native residents of "rural" Alaska. The Committee adopted an amendment to clarify this point by limiting application of the definition to areas of "rural" Alaska including communities such as Dillingham, Bethel, Nome, Kotzebue, Barrow, and other Native and non-Native villages scattered throughout the State. However, the Committee does not intend to imply that the rural nature of such communities is a static condition; the direction of the economic development and rural character of such communities may change over time. It should be emphasized that this amendment is not intended to impose a "durational" rural residency requirement in the defintion or impede the traditional movement of Alaska residents between the rural areas and the major population centers and vice versa.

(Emphasis supplied.)

The foregoing gives no credence at all to Plaintiff's population argument. While Congress certainly did contrast the cities of Ketchikan, Juneau, Anchorage, and Fairbanks on the one hand, to Dillingham, Bethel, Nome, Kotzebue, and Barrow on the other hand, there is simply no suggestion that either the Secretary or the State of Alaska in implementing the subsistence priority provided for in ANILCA would be governed by the population of any given area. On the contrary, the quoted language, and in particular the reference to Dillingham, Bethel, Nome, Kotzebue, and Barrow, which were considered by Congress to be part of "rural" Alaska, strongly suggest that the density or sparseness of population was not a primary consideration. In this regard, the Court takes judicial notice of the fact that the last-named cities are the largest, most heavily populated centers of government and commerce in western Alaska. Plainly, Congress had something other than population per se in mind by the creation of a dichotomy between Ketchikan, Juneau, Anchorage, and Fairbanks on the one hand, and Dillingham, Bethel, Nome, Kotzebue, and Barrow on the other.

The Court is convinced that what Congress had in mind is precisely what the legislature of the State of Alaska expressed when it defined "rural area". Whereas the State expressed itself in terms of subsistence uses being a "principal characteristic of the economy", Congress, in the above report, expressed the same concept by saying that while Ketchikan, Juneau, Anchorage, and Fairbanks residents harvest renewable resources for personal or family use, "by its very nature" the subsistence lifestyle ("subsistence use") is carried on in other parts of the state, not the larger cities. The Court simply cannot read into any of the foregoing a population concept or requirement for locating or siting subsistence uses of resources.

Moreover, the same above quoted passage from the senate report characterizes rural Alaska in terms of economic considerations. Congress expressly recognizes that what is presently a rural area may not be such in the future due to "the direction of the economic development . . . [of an area] over time." Thus the economic characterization of subsistence areas employed by the State is quite consistent with legislative history.

Debate before the House of Representatives, and in particular the presentation of Congressman Udall of Arizona, the prime sponsor of what became ANILCA, is of the same tenor on this subject. 125 Cong. Rec. H2692 (daily ed. May 4, 1979) (statement of Rep. Udall). Congressman Udall's presentation gives no comfort whatsoever to Plaintiff's contention that rural areas were to be determined by their population. On the other hand, the congressman's remarks do lend support to the State's view that what was to be fostered and protected by ANILCA was a very special economic system which was at times referred to as a way of life. In particular, the Congressman spoke to the matter of "subsistence uses" as follows:

> Mr. Chairman, the economic life of Alaska's rural villages is grounded on subsistence hunting, fishing, and gathering activities with only limited participation in the urban cash economy.

Id. at H2697.

The Court concludes that Plaintiff is wrong when it contends that population considerations were to be the measure of where subsistence uses would have priority. The Court further concludes that the State of Alaska is correct in its contention that it must provide priority for subsistence uses in those portions of the state where the subsistence way of life is a principal characteristic of the economy.

Conclusion

Plaintiff's motion for a preliminary injunction is denied. Plaintiff's motion for summary judgment is denied. Defendant's cross-motion seeking dismissal of Plaintiff's complaint for lack of standing is denied. Defendant's cross-motion for summary judgment is granted; however, this grant of summary judgment pertains only to the legal issue briefed by the parties, and does not dispose of Plaintiff's complaint. At this stage of the proceedings, the Court has determined only that there is no inconsistency between the Alaska subsistence statutes and ANILCA.

At the last status conference held in this case, Plaintiff requested that in rendering a ruling on the foregoing motions the Court render a final judgment under Rule 54(b), Federal Rules of Civil Procedure. As the Court suggested in its April 15, 1987, order, the Court believed, and now concludes, that this matter is not susceptible to entry of any judgment which could be rendered final by application of Rule 54(b). However, the same result sought by Plaintiff can be achieved by an appropriate finding under 28 U.S.C. § 1292(b). The Court is satisfied that the foregoing order is an appropriate subject for an interlocutory appeal under section 1292(b).

The dispute between the parties over the compatibility of ANILCA and the Alaska subsistence laws is a controlling question of law. Although the Court is convinced of the correctness of its decision, the Court is not prepared to state that there is no room for a difference of opinion on the question presented.

More importantly, the issue of subsistence hunting and fishing rights is one of immense importance for the people of the State of Alaska. As is suggested by the lengthy history of this matter set out hereinabove, what the Court here decides and will in the future decide in this case impacts not just the Plaintiff's members and Defendant, but all subsistence users of fish and game, all sport fishermen and hunters, and many commercial fisherman of the State of Alaska. Therefore, it would be most disruptive if this Court were to proceed to the second phase of the case, only to later have the Court of Appeals determine that ANILCA and the Alaska subsistence laws are not compatible. In addition, the remaining portions of this case will require extensive work by Court and counsel which would be a total waste if the legal predicate herein contained, and on the basis of which the Court proposes to go forward with this litigation, were held to be incorrect. This is not a case where there is any likelihood of multiple appeals of the same issue. The Court is of the view that an interlocutory appeal would materially aid this Court in moving forward to the ultimate termination of this litigation which raises crucial issues as to fish and wildlife management in the State of Alaska.

QUESTION PRESENTED

Section 804 of Title VIII of the Alaska National Interest Lands Conservation Act (ANILCA) provides that the taking of fish and wildlife "for nonwasteful subsistence uses shall be accorded priority over the taking. . . of fish and wildlife for other purposes." 16 U.S.C. § 3114. Section 803 describes who is entitled to the priority by defining "subsistence uses" as the "customary and traditional uses by rural Alaska residents of wild, renewable resources" for a variety of uses. 16 U.S.C. § 3113 (emphasis added).

The sole question presented by this case is whether the term "rural" should be given its plain and ordinary meaning.

STATE OF ALASKA,

Petitioner,

v.

KENAITZE INDIAN TRIBE,

Respondent.

RESPONDENT'S BRIEF IN OPPOSITION

Respondent Kenaitze Indian Tribe respectfully requests the Court to deny the petition for a writ of certiorari seeking review of the Ninth Circuit's opinion in this case. That opinion is reported at 860 F.2d 312 (1989), and is reproduced in Pet. App. A-1 - A-23. The Court of Appeals rejected a suggestion for rehearing en banc, with no judge requesting a vote. Pet. App. A-2. After the denial of stay applications by the Court of Appeals and this Court, the district court entered a preliminary injunction on April 25, 1989, which is reproduced in the appendix to this opposition. App. 1a-10a.

STATEMENT OF THE CASE

The Kenaitze Indian Tribe brought this action pursuant to § 807 of the Alaska National Interest Lands

Conservation Act (ANILCA)[1], 16 U.S.C. § 3117, to prevent the State of Alaska from denying its members the federal statutory protections for subsistence hunting and fishing guaranteed all "rural Alaska residents." Sections 803 and 804 of ANILCA provide that "rural Alaska residents" engaged in customary and traditional harvests of fish and game are entitled to a priority over all other competing users. The controversy in the courts below centered upon the meaning of the word "rural" in § 803 of ANILCA.

As their name suggests, members of the Kenaitze Indian Tribe have lived for centuries on the Kenai Peninsula along the coast of Cook Inlet in southcentral Alaska. For most of their history they have pursued a way of life centered upon subsistence hunting and fishing. In recognition that subsistence activities are essential to the continued physical, economic, traditional and cultural existence of Alaska Natives, Congress has provided statutory protections for those uses of fish and wildlife since territorial days. See, e.g., Act of June 13, 1902, 32 Stat. 327; Act of May 11, 1908, 35 Stat. 102; Act of January 13, 1925, 43 Stat. 739, 744. Adhering to this policy when Alaska became a state in 1959, Congress conditioned statehood on the State's agreement not to curtail or interfere with aboriginal hunting and fishing rights. Act of July 7, 1958, § 4, 72 Stat. 339.

Statehood did not, however, leave the subsistence uses of Alaska Natives unaffected. State regulatory restrictions on all Native subsistence harvests, including those of the respondent Tribe, proliferated after the responsibility for managing fish and game was transferred from the federal government to the State. These restrictions were imposed by regulatory bodies which were dominated by urban sport and commercial interests.[2] Controlled by these interests, the State regulatory system favored sport and commercial hunting and fishing, and was insensitive and unsympathetic to Native subsistence uses. "Indeed, the latter was substantially ignored by the State of Alaska for many years." App. 2a-3a.[3]

On remand, the district court drew a similar conclusion from the State's opposition to preliminary injunctive relief: "The State's arguments of severe economic consequences to those dependent upon the sport fishery on the Kenai Peninsula for their livelihood are, in a way, proof of the Ninth Circuit's accusation that the State's priorities have not been where they should have been under both state and federal law." terior nor the State moved to protect the subsistence needs of Alaska Natives.[5] This lack of action was nowhere more evident than on the Kenai Peninsula. While Congress extinguished the aboriginal hunting and fishing rights in addition to the right of occupancy upon which the claims were based, 43 U.S.C. § 1603, it did so only after directing the Secretary of the Interior and the State of Alaska to "take any action necessary to protect the subsistence needs of the Natives." Braund's study compares commercial, sport and subsistence harvests in Upper Cook Inlet (which embraces the Kenai Peninsula). For the years 1977 through 1980, the percentage of the Upper Cook Inlet salmon harvest attributable to subsistence fishermen constituted only .008 percent in 1977, .07 percent in 1978, .47 percent in 1979, and .33 percent in 1980.

vest allocated to urban sport and commercial fishers.[7] The State prohibited subsistence fishing during the months of May, June and July, restricted subsistence fishing during the months of August and September to twelve hours per week, restricted the size of the nets which could be used to subsistence fish, lowered the yearly catch limit per head of household, and closed the best subsistence fishing spots, leaving the Kenaitze six miles of inaccessible, boulder-strewn beach on which to fish.[8]

This hostility to subsistence uses, evidenced by the onerous regulation on the Kenai Peninsula as well as elsewhere throughout the State, led to the passage of Title VIII of ANILCA in 1980. 16 U.S.C. §§ 3111-26. A "treaty substitute,"[9] Title VIII implements Congress' long-standing concern for, and obligation to protect, subsistence uses of Alaska Natives, and serves to fulfill the purposes of the Alaska Native Claims Settlement Act. 16 U.S.C. § 3111(4). Title VIII expresses an overriding congressional policy of protecting the subsistence rights of Alaska Natives.[10]

[10] Although the principal impetus for Congress' passage of Title VIII was its commitment to protect the subsistence rights of Alaska Natives, at the behest of the State of Alaska, the Congress prefaced Title VIII with a declaration that "the continuation of the opportunity for subsistence uses by rural residents of Alaska . . . is essential to Native physical, economic, traditional and cultural existence . . . ." 16 U.S.C. § 3111(1). Congress further found that because "continuation of the opportunity for subsistence uses of resources on public and other lands in Alaska is threatened by the increasing population of Alaska, . . . [and] by increased accessibility of remote areas containing subsistence resources," 16 U.S.C. § 3111(3), it was necessary and in the national interest "to protect and provide the opportunity for continued subsistence uses on the public lands by Native and non-Native rural residents." 16 U.S.C. § 3111(4), (5).

To achieve these ends, Congress provided that "the taking on public lands of fish and wildlife for nonwasteful subsistence uses shall be accorded priority over the taking on such lands of fish and wildlife for other purposes." 16 U.S.C. § 3114. It defined "subsistence uses" as "the customary and traditional uses by rural Alaska residents of wild, renewable resources" for a variety of purposes. 16 U.S.C. § 3113 (emphasis added). Finally, Congress created a program of cooperative federalism in which it directed the Secretary of the Interior to establish the administrative structure necessary for implementation of the statutory priority on federal lands and waters,[11] 16 U.S.C. § 3115(a)-(c), and then offered back to the State the opportunity to retain management authority over fish and wildlife on all federal lands and waters if the State adopted the federal policy of protecting subsistence uses by "enact[ing] and implement[ing] laws of general applicability which are consistent with, and which provide for the definition, preference, and participation specified in, sections 3113, 3114, and 3115 of this title." 16 U.S.C. § 3115(d). By virtue of § 807, the federal courts were entrusted with the duty of enforcing (against either the Secretary or the State, as the case might be) the priority policy prescribed by Congress.[12] 16 U.S.C. § 3117.

> The Committee notes that the Alaska Native people have been living a subsistence way of life for thousands of years, and that the Alaska Native way of life in rural Alaska may be the last major remnant of the subsistence culture alive today in North America. In addition, there is also a significant non-Native population residing in rural Alaska which in recent times has developed a subsistence lifestyle that also is a cultural value.

This land is held in the form of National Wildlife Refuges, Parks, Preserves, Monuments, Conservation Areas, Recreation Areas, and Forests, as well as military properties and land held by the Bureau of Land Management.

[12] After extensive debate, Congress determined that the private attorney general model was best suited to ensuring regulatory compliance with the subsistence priority. See discussion at pp. 22-23, infra.

"Given the choice between federal regulation or self-regulation with federal oversight, Alaska chose the latter. The state enacted the necessary statutes in 1978, while Congress was still working on the final version of ANILCA." Pet. App. A-5.[13] In the wake of the 1980 enactment of ANILCA, the State Joint Boards of Fish and Game developed pertinent regulations which, inter alia, defined the term "rural" in its ordinary demographic sense as any area other than a community "with a population of 7,000 or more." Id. "In 1982, the Secretary of the Interior certified that the state legislative program was in compliance with ANILCA. Because the State Boards of Fisheries and Game refused to embrace the subsistence priority, the

[13] As recently described by the district court, the 1978 State law:

> [R]adically altered the priorities between commercial and sport fisheries on the one hand, and subsistence hunting and fishing on the other hand . . . . The State's subsistence law embodied a major policy trade-off whereby Alaska decided that unified management of fish and game on all public lands (both state and federal) in Alaska by the Alaska Department of Fish and Game was more important to efficient and effective game management in the State of Alaska than was the State's then extant scheme of priorities which in substance and effect placed commercial and sport fishing and hunting above subsistence fishing and hunting in priority.

App. 2a.

State's paper compliance was short lived. Immediately after the certification process was completed, the Joint Boards promptly moved to restrict the subsistence preference in instances where it conflicted with sport and commercial uses. This goal was effectuated by revoking the demographic definition of "rural," grafting a "subsistence community residency requirement" onto ANILCA's rural residency requirement, and then selectively applying the requirement to exclude those subsistence fishing efforts which might interfere with sport and commercial uses. The principal effect of the new regulations was to deny the subsistence priority to members of the Kenaitze Indian Tribe—as well as other rural residents who lived in areas of the State (including the Kenai Peninsula) where the economy of the area is no longer subsistence-based. Pet. App. A-6.

The Board's administrative rewrite of the statute suffered a temporary set-back in 1986 when the Alaska Supreme Court threw out the regulations embodying the "subsistence community" residency requirement on the ground that they were inconsistent with state law. Madison v. Alaska Dept. of Fish and Game, 696 P.2d 168 (Alaska 1985). Thereafter, the State legislature amended its subsistence law to overrule the Madison decision, essentially adopting the Board's previous criteria for determining eligibility for the subsistence preference. To qualify for the State preference, one must establish residence in rural Alaska and residence in a community, the economy of which is subsistence-based. As amended, the State statute provides a subsistence preference only to those rural residents who live in "a community or area of the state in which the noncommercial, customary, and traditional use of fish or game for personal or family consumption is a principal characteristic of the economy of the community or area." Ch. 52, SLA 1986 at § 11, codified at ALASKA STAT. 16.05.940(25) (emphasis added).[14]

Respondent Kenaitze Indian Tribe reacted to passage of the State's amended law by filing this action pursuant to § 807 of ANILCA, 16 U.S.C. § 3117. Its claim is simple. Its members live in an area of Alaska which is unquestionably rural under any common understanding of that term. For centuries they had pursued a way of life sustained entirely by hunting and fishing. Under the express terms of §§ 803 and 804 of ANILCA, their subsistence harvests are entitled to priority over commercial and sport harvests. Yet, because of the State's "subsistence community" residency requirement, they were being denied the subsistence priority solely because of events beyond their control—the presence and influence of a cash economy and culture.

[14] Despite the fact that Congress had expressly provided that only a State subsistence law passed before 3 December 1982 would be eligible for certification, 16 U.S.C. § 3115(d), the Secretary of the Interior had notified the State in September 1985 that the Madison decision put the State out of compliance with ANILCA and had threatened a federal takeover of fish and wildlife management on federal lands. Pet. App. A-6, B-9 - B-10. Following the State legislature's 1986 actions, the State requested that the Secretary certify that its new law restored it to a position of compliance. An Assistant Secretary then wrote a letter to the Governor of Alaska purporting to so certify. Id. at A-6-7, B-12. The Court of Appeals correctly concluded that these actions by the Secretary "had no legally operative effect." Pet. App. A-9.

The district court upheld the State's definition of "rural area" as being consistent with ANILCA. Pet. App. B-18 - B-27. The Court of Appeals unanimously reversed. It first determined that the interpretation adopted by the Department of the Interior and the State of Alaska was due no deference. Interpreting the statute's meaning de novo, the Court of Appeals found that Congress used the term "rural" in its plain and ordinary sense to refer to areas of Alaska that are "sparsely populated." Pet. App. A-12. It concluded that the State's definition of rural could not be accepted in any case since to do so would "materially change the sweep of the statute . . . and lead to an inconsistency within the statute." Id. at A-14. By contrast, the Court found nothing in the Act's structure or its relationship to other statutes which called into question the plain meaning of the term rural. Relying on this Court's admonition in Amoco Production Company v. Village of Gambell, 480 U.S. 531 (1987), the lower court refused to resort to the legislative history in search of a mysterious contrary meaning. Concluding that the State's definition of rural was inconsistent with ANILCA, the Court of Appeals remanded the case to the district court for the entry of a preliminary injunction.

REASONS FOR DENYING THE WRIT

The Court of Appeals correctly determined that Congress intended the term "rural" in ANILCA to have its plain and ordinary meaning. In accordance with well-established principles of statutory construction, it refused to resort to the Act's legislative history in search of a different meaning, a search that would have proved as futile as it would have been wasteful. The Court also correctly declined to give deference (though not consideration) to the interpretation of the State and the Secretary of the Interior, against whom this remedial legislation was specifically aimed. Finally, the Court of Appeals' decision does not conflict with any decision of this Court or any other court, nor does it present an issue of any general importance that warrants review by this Court.

I. THIS CASE PRESENTS NO IMPORTANT PRACTICAL OR LEGAL ISSUES

The State alleges that this case presents issues of vital importance to all Alaskans, because by expanding the class eligible for subsistence hunting and fishing, the Court of Appeals' decision significantly dilutes the subsistence protections of ANILCA and harms those rural residents who are economically dependent upon subsistence uses. Cert. Pet. at 10. Also implicated, according to the State, are "profoundly fundamental issues of state and federal authority." These issues allegedly arise because the finding that the State's definition of "rural area" is inconsistent with ANILCA could result in the State losing management responsibility over fish and game on the public lands, resulting in a patchwork system of management responsibility in Alaska between the federal and state governments. Cert. Pet. at 10-11.

The State grossly exaggerates both the practical and the legal consequences of the Court of Appeals' decision. As a practical matter, the decision is of little immediate consequence. It is interlocutory in nature, and merely directs the district court to enter a preliminary injunction which will allow members of the Kenaitze Indian Tribe who live on the Kenai Peninsula—approximately 400 in number—to subsistence fish pending a final decision on the merits.[15] Historically, the Upper Cook Inlet salmon harvested for subsistence uses has been de minimus compared to the modern-day commercial and sport harvests. Extending the statutory priority to the subsistence harvests of Kenaitze tribal members during the pendency of this litigation cannot credibly produce the dire consequences forecast by the State.

Nor can there be long-term consequences which are of great importance. While the lower court decision implicitly rejects the State's restrictive definition of the word "rural," it did not, as the State suggests, dilute the subsistence protections of ANILCA. The very notion that the Court of Appeals has "expanded" subsistence rights contradicts the contention that it has somehow restricted or "diluted" them. Under ANILCA, subsistence uses cannot be restricted until other competing uses have been eliminated. If, after closing all non-subsistence harvests, the State still finds it necessary to restrict the taking of fish or wildlife for subsistence uses, § 804 not only allows—but dictates—that the State limit subsistence uses to those who have a "direct dependence" on those uses. 16 U.S.C. § 3114; Pet. App. A-14. Thus, extending the general priority to all "rural Alaska residents"

[15] In the district court the State has filed motions to dismiss contesting federal jurisdiction under § 807 and the Eleventh Amendment, challenging plaintiff's standing with respect to salmon fishing, and requesting a remand to the Board of Fisheries to determine whether the Tribe qualifies for "customary and traditional uses" of salmon. By order entered on May 4, 1989, the district court denied these motions and refused to certify its rulings for interlocutory appeal. The court indicated, however, that some aspects of the State's motions went to the merits of the case which have not yet been decided.

does not prevent the State, in times of shortages, from restricting the priority to those subsistence users most dependent upon the resources.

The supposed issue of a conflict between state and federal authority is even more difficult to ascertain. It appears to be premised upon the State's incorrect assertion that the Secretary of the Interior must now step in and take over management of fish and game on the public lands in Alaska because the State's law is no longer consistent with federal law. Such is not the case. Section 805(d) of ANILCA expressly provides that the State may continue to manage fish and wildlife on both federal and state lands unless and until the State legislature repeals the State's subsistence law. 16 U.S.C. § 3115(d). Although the State is free, as it always has been, to decline to participate in the cooperative federalism program created by Title VIII, absent a repeal of its subsistence law there is no statutory authority for the Secretary to step in and assume management responsibility over fish and game on the public lands.

The courts below have made clear that such a result is entirely in the hands of the State. Pet. App. A-16 n. 8; App. 6a. The Court of Appeals specifically reminded the State of its bargain:

> We do not purport to be directing the state to amend its laws; it is free to eschew any further entanglement with the federal government by advising the Department of the Interior that it is withdrawing from its role in administering ANILCA.

Pet. App. A-16 n. 8. Indeed, the district court has gone the extra mile with the State and given it another opportunity to withdraw from the ANILCA program. App. 9a. Of some interest is the fact that the State, on May 5, 1989, notified the court that it does not intend to withdraw at this time from its role in administering ANILCA.

If the State of Alaska eventually opts out of its role in administering ANILCA, it will be by choice. Unless and until it does so, however, there can be no doubt that the State must accord subsistence harvests of Cook Inlet salmon, small as they are, priority over all other competing uses.

II. THE DECISION OF THE COURT OF APPEALS IS CONSISTENT WITH THE DECISIONS OF THIS COURT

Lacking an issue of general importance, or even arguable merit, the State has attempted to manufacture a conflict between the lower court's decision in this case and this Court's decision in Chevron, U.S.A., Inc. v. Natural Resources Defense Council, 467 U.S. 837 (1984). It claims that the lower court ignored the "methodology" established by this Court "for interpreting statutes," Cert. Pet. at 12, even though the Ninth Circuit "purports to follow that methodology." Id.

In reaching its decision, the Court of Appeals relied upon the principles of statutory construction reiterated by this Court, without dissent, in Amoco Production Co. v. Village of Gambell, 480 U.S. 531 (1987)—a case interpreting this very statute. In determining the meaning of the phrase "in Alaska," the Court made clear that:

> When statutory language is plain, and nothing in the Act's structure or relationship to other statutes calls into question this plain > meaning, that is ordinarily "the end of the matter." Chevron U.S.A. Inc. v. Natural Resources Defense Council, Inc., 467 U.S. 837, 842 (1984). "Going behind the plain language of a statute in search of a possibly contrary congressional intent is a step to be taken cautiously even under the best of circumstances." United States v. Locke, 471 U.S. at 95-96. . .

Amoco Production, 480 U.S. at 552-53.

Applying these principles, the Court of Appeals concluded that the word "rural" has a plain and simple meaning:

> The term rural is not difficult to understand; it is not a term of art. It is a standard word in the English language commonly understood to refer to areas of the country that are sparsely populated. . . . More broadly, rural is the antonym of urban and includes all areas in between cities and towns of a particular size.

Pet. App. A-12 (citations omitted). To argue that the word has no plain meaning, the State seizes upon the fact that the Court of Appeals cited a number of different contexts in which the federal government had used the term rural. Cert. Pet. at 12. Obviously, the Court of Appeals recognized that the definition of rural will vary depending upon its context. The point it made was that in every instance where the federal government has used the term, it has been "consistent with conventional understanding." Pet. App. A-12. The State, on the other hand, failed to cite a single federal statute or regulation in which the word rural has been used in any sense other than the commonly accepted one. Pet. App. A-13.

Further undermining the merits of the State's argument is the fact that the lower court did not rest its decision entirely upon the fact that "rural" has a plain meaning. It concluded that "[e]ven if the state's interpretation were otherwise permissible, [it] would have to [be] reject[ed] . . . in the name of internal statutory consistency." Pet. App. A-15. This conclusion was based upon the fact that ANILCA "establishes not one but two levels of priority." Pet. App. A-14. In the first tier, "Congress did not limit the benefits of the statute to residents of areas dominated by a subsistence economy. Instead, it wrote broadly, giving the statutory priority to all subsistence users residing in rural areas." Pet. App. A-14 (emphasis added). But if the resources are diminished to the point that there are insufficient numbers to satisfy all rural subsistence users, the statute provides a higher priority for those rural residents who can establish that they have a "customary and direct dependence upon the [fish and wildlife] populations as the mainstay of livelihood," live closest to the resources, and have the least access to alternative resources. Pet. App. A-14, quoting 16 U.S.C. § 3114. The State's unusual socio-economic definition of "rural" extends the general subsistence priority created by § 803 of ANILCA only to this preferred class of rural Alaska residents, thus rendering the two-tier priority system of § 804 redundant. The Court of Appeals correctly rejected the State's interpretation in favor of one that not only avoids such redundancy, but one that is also more protective.

The Court of Appeals was thus scrupulously faithful to the "fundamental canon of statutory construction that the words of a statute must be read in their context and with a view to their place in the overall statutory scheme." Davis v. Michigan Dept. of Treasury, 109 S.Ct. 1500, 1504 (1989). But despite the fact that the term rural has a commonly understood meaning which is consistent with and furthers ANILCA's purpose and structure, the State maintains that the judges below erred in not considering the legislative history. Recognizing that legislative history "cannot overcome the structural and semantic problems" with the State's definition of "rural," Pet. App. A-15, however, the Court of Appeals correctly refused the gambit. Manifestly, this is not one of those " 'rare cases [in which] the literal application of a statute will produce a result demonstrably at odds with the intention of its drafters.' " United States v. Ron Pair Enterprises, Inc., 109 S.Ct. 1026, 1031 (1989), quoting Griffin v. Oceanic Contractors, Inc., 458 U.S. 564, 571 (1982).

Even had the Court of Appeals jumped at the State's straw man, it would have landed at the same spot. The legislative history defies the State's assertion that Congress used the term "rural" in anything other than its ordinary sense. In contending that Congress intended rural to refer to "subsistence communities," the State cites a single excerpt from a Senate Committee Report which contrasts "cities" with rural communities in Alaska. Cert. Pet. at 16, relying upon S. REP. NO. 96-413, 96th Cong., 1st Sess. 233 (1979), reprinted in 1980 U.S. CODE CONG. & AD. NEWS 5070, 5177. By contrasting the State's largest cities with various rural communities, this history actually supports the Court of Appeals' conclusion that Congress used the term rural in its usual demographic sense. Since cities are areas with relatively high populations and population densities, Congress obviously considered "rural" areas to be those regions with relatively small populations and low population densities.[16] In connection with the need for legislation to protect subsistence uses in rural Alaska, Congress referenced again and again the fact that subsistences uses were being threatened by the rapid "population growth" of the State's urban centers. 16 U.S.C. § 3111(3); accord, e.g., H.R. REP. NO. 96-97, Part I, 96th Cong., 1st Sess. 278 (1979).

Finally, ANILCA's legislative history reveals that Congress expressly rejected the economically-oriented approach to the allocation of the subsistence preference exemplified by the State's definition of rural. Rather than conditioning the priority upon the degree to which an individual was able to participate in the [16] In every instance where Congress identified those areas it considered "urban," it referred to the State's four most populous cities. See, e.g., S. REP. NO. 96-413, supra n. 10, at 233; H.R. REP. NO. 96-97, Part I, 96th Cong., 1st Sess. 278 (1979); 125 CONG. REC. 11,426 (1979) (Congressman McCloskey). It never once identified any community on the Kenai Peninsula as "urban." In fact, by referencing the intended beneficiaries of the Act as the "more than two hundred Native Villages scattered throughout rural Alaska," 126 CONG. REC. 29,278 (1980), ANILCA's legislative history demonstrates that Congress in fact considered the Kenai Peninsula to be rural. Congress referred to the Native villages whose land claims were extinguished by the Alaska Native Claims Settlement Act. 43 U.S.C. § 1610(a)(2)(3). A number of Native villages located on the Kenai Peninsula are included in that list, including Ninilchik, English Bay, Port Graham, Salamatof, Seldovia and Tyonek.

cash economy, Congress chose instead to preserve an individual's right to choose whether to pursue a subsistence lifeway or lifestyle. See, e.g., H.R. REP. NO. 95-1045, Part I, 95th Cong., 2d Sess. 187 (1978) ("Furnishing protection of subsistence patterns of existence will allow Native peoples . . . the opportunity to [decide for themselves the rate at which acculturation will take place]"); 126 CONG. REC. 29,279 (1980) (the Act is intended to allow Alaska Natives "to choose for themselves the direction and pace, if any, of the evolution of their own culture"). Congress fully expected that many rural residents would live in areas of the State where the prevailing economy was not subsistence based. Indeed, Congress made clear that economic factors were not to be determinative of a person's eligibility for the subsistence preference by rejecting all proposals which would have employed income requirements. See, e.g, 126 CONG. REC. 29,279 (1980) (Congressman Udall) (Congressional "policy also requires that regulatory systems which employ income requirements not be imposed upon rural residents").[17]

III. THE SECRETARY'S "CONSISTENCY DETERMINATION" IS DUE NO DEFERENCE UNDER PRINCIPLES OF STATUTORY CONSTRUCTION OR THE SEPARATION OF POWERS DOCTRINE

The State's final argument is that by refusing to defer to the Secretary of the Interior's consistency determination, the Court of Appeals violated the statutory construction principles established by this Court, as well as the constitutional separation of powers doctrine. Cert. Pet. at 17-18. As an initial matter, the canon of construction which provides that courts should show deference to an administrative agency's construction of a statute has no application in this case since the intent of Congress is clear from the language and structure of the Act. See Amoco Production Co., 480 U.S. at 552-53, quoting Chevron, U.S.A., Inc. v. Natural Resources Defense Council, 467 U.S. 837, 842 (1984). A fundamental principle of statutory construction is that a plain and unambiguous statutory command cannot be rendered ambiguous by a contrary administrative interpretation. Morton v. Ruiz, 415 U.S. 199, 236-37 (1974).

[17] See, e.g., Transcript of Proceedings, Hearing on H.R. 39, Alaska National Interest Lands Conservation Act, Held Before the Subcommittee on General Oversight and Alaska Lands of the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, 95th Cong., 2d Sess. 799 (Jan. 30, 1978) (Congressman Sloss speaking to the proposed definition of "subsistence uses" in H.R. 39 stated that it contained nothing "which would prevent subsistence users from taking part in the cash flow economy as well").

Equally fundamental is the principle that deference is due an administrative agency's construction of a statute only when it is entrusted with the administration of the statute. Chevron, U.S.A., Inc. v. Natural Resources Defense Council, Inc., 467 U.S. 837, 844 (1984); Blum v. Bacon, 457 U.S. 132, 141 (1982). Congress did not entrust the Secretary, who was an equally targeted wrongdoer in the erosion of Native subsistence rights, with the administration of §§ 803 and 804 of ANILCA. Instead, it gave the Secretary a limited role in the interpretation and enforcement of the subsistence preference: the role of certification of the State's subsistence law in 1982, and of monitoring and reporting to Congress thereafter. 16 U.S.C. §§ 3115, 3116, 3123; Pet. App. A-9. Since the Secretary's "recertification" of the State's 1986 subsistence law exceeded his statutory authority, the Court of Appeals correctly refused to give deference to the interpretation embodied in that determination. Pet. App. A-9.

Section 805 provides the basic structure for implementation of the priorities created by sections 803 and 804. 16 U.S.C. § 3115. Section 807 provides the means by which the preference is enforced. 16 U.S.C. § 3117. Together these provisions allowed the State of Alaska to assume responsibility for fish and game management on federal lands and waters in Alaska if, within one year of the passage of Title VIII, the State enacted and implemented "laws of general applicability which [were] consistent with, and which provide[d] for the definition, preference and participation specified in sections 803, 804 and 805." 16 U.S.C. § 3115(d). Once the State enacted such laws, and the Secretary certified the State to assume management authority, the Secretary's role in the enforcement of the preference was at an end. His role thereafter was limited to monitoring the State's compliance and reporting to Congress. See 16 U.S.C. §§ 3116 and 3123. Absent a repeal of the State's subsistence laws, 16 U.S.C. § 3115(d), there is no statutory authority for the Secretary to rescind his certification of the State's subsistence management program and take over management of wildlife on the public lands in Alaska. If the preference is not being respected, enforcement lies in the hands of private attorneys general and the federal courts, 16 U.S.C. § 3117,[18] as the Ninth Circuit correctly held. Pet. App. A-9.

[18] The Deputy Undersecretary for the Department of Interior acknowledged this fact in testimony before the Joint Boards of Fisheries and Game in 1982, when he stated: "There is no provision for federal administrative takeover of the program once it's approved." Testimony of William Horn, Deputy Undersec-

The legislative history of sections 805 and 807 demonstrates that Congress expressly rejected proposals which would have given the Secretary authority to recertify the 1986 State subsistence law. Initial drafts of section 807 of ANILCA gave Interior the authority to regulate the State's implementation of the subsistence preference.[19] As the bill evolved, Congress eventually took away the Secretary's authority to suspend his approval of the State's law and limited his regulatory authority to filing suit in federal court to require the State to take such actions as were necessary to provide for the subsistence priority. H.R. 39, 96th Cong., 1st Sess., § 707 (1979), discussed in H.R. REP. NO. 96-97, Part II, 96th Cong., 1st Sess. at 196. Congress ultimately rejected even this form of administrative enforcement in favor of the present private attorney general model embodied in § 807 of ANILCA.[20] As enacted, § 807 of ANILCA delegates retary, Department of the Interior, Before Joint Meeting of the Boards of Fish and Game (April 5, 1982) (CR 29, Attachment 1 at 19-20).

[19] The first drafts provided that if the State was not respecting the federal subsistence priority, the Secretary was to "notify the State and . . . indicate changes in [the] program or its implementation [required] to bring the State into compliance." H.R. 39, 95th Cong., 2d Sess. § 705 (1978), reprinted in H.R. REP. NO. 95-1045, Part I, 95th Cong., 2d Sess. 30 (1978). If the State failed to make the changes indicated, the Secretary was given the authority to issue an interim suspension of the certificate of approval. After an opportunity to appeal, the Secretary was authorized to "issue a final suspension of the certification . . . and assume . . . responsibility for regulating the taking of fish and wildlife for subsistence uses on the public lands . . . ." Id.

[20] Congress rejected the administrative enforcement model proposed in 1978 largely at the behest of the State, which sought to insure that Interior played no role in actively enforcing the all authority for interpreting and enforcing the subsistence preference to the federal courts. 16 U.S.C. § 3117(a).

Finally, an important aspect of a federal court's role in checking the power of its sister branches of government is its review of Executive branch actions to insure that they comply with constitutionally imposed legislative commands. Since there was no legislative authority for the Secretary's recertification of the State's compliance with ANILCA, the lower court's refusal to give deference to the Secretary's "consistency determination" is fully consistent with its constitutional duty to maintain the separation of federal powers envisioned by the Constitution.

CONCLUSION

This case was correctly decided below, and it presents no substantial questions of federal law or any other matter of sufficient importance to warrant this Court's consideration. Accordingly, the petition for a writ of certiorari should be denied.

subsistence preference. The State believed that Interior's involvement would subject subsistence users to "illusory protection from arbitrary administrative determinations." 126 CONG. REC. 31,110 (1980) (Sen. Stevens). The State also objected to the 1979 version which called for the Secretary to file suit on behalf of aggrieved subsistence users, citing "the difficult nature of its relationship with the Federal government which could result from the use of section 807, and the resultant damage to the traditional State-Federal and wildlife management relationship." Id.

IN THE UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT FOR THE DISTRICT OF ALASKA

No.A86-367 Civil

KENAITZE INDIAN TRIBE,

Plaintiff,

vs.

STATE OF ALASKA,

Defendant.

PRELIMINARY INJUNCTION

Introduction

By order filed July 9, 1987, the court granted defendant State of Alaska's motion for summary judgment whereby the court determined that there was no inconsistency between Alaska's subsistence statute, AS 16.05.258, and relevant definitions, such as AS 16.05.940(25), and the provisions of the Alaska National Interest Lands Conservation Act (ANILCA). Plaintiff appealed. On October 28, 1988, the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals filed its opinion which reversed the foregoing order and remanded the case to this court "for entry of a preliminary injunction." Kenaitze Indian Tribe v. State of Alaska, 860 F.2d 312, 318 (9th Cir. 1988). In a concurring opinion, two of the three-judge panel joined in holding that plaintiff:

> [I]s entitled to an injunction providing that subsistence uses of fish by members of the Tribe > shall be given a priority by the state over all other uses so far as necessary as to preserve the subsistence uses of such users. 16 U.S.C. § 3114.

Id. at 321.

The State of Alaska sought rehearing before the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals which was denied. The State of Alaska has also petitioned the United States Supreme Court for a writ of certiorari, which application is still pending. No stay has been granted by any court as regards the mandate of the court of appeals which was received by this court on or about March 1, 1989.

Being in some doubt as to exactly how best to formulate the preliminary injunction which it was directed to enter, the court called upon the parties to confer with one another and to present their joint or respective positions as regards a preliminary injunction to the court. The latter process has now been completed. The court has before it two suggested forms of preliminary injunction which are vastly different.

Discussion

In 1978, the legislature of the State of Alaska made a policy decision by enacting a subsistence statute which radically altered the priorities between commercial and sport fisheries on the one hand, and subsistence hunting and fishing on the other hand. Ch. 151, SLA 1978. The State's subsistence law embodied a major policy trade-off whereby Alaska decided that unified management of fish and game on all public lands (both state and federal) in Alaska by the Alaska Department of Fish & Game was more important to efficient and effective game management in the State of Alaska than was the State's then extant scheme of priorities which in substance and effect placed commercial and sport fishing and hunting above subsistence fishing and hunting in priority. Indeed, the latter was substantially ignored by the State of Alaska for many years.

In 1986, as a result of a decision of the Alaska Supreme Court in Madison v. Alaska Dept. of Fish & Game, 696 P.2d 168 (Alaska 1985), the Alaska legislature again considered this subject and again enacted a statute, the purpose of which was to afford to subsistence hunters and fishermen priority as regards the use of fish and game over other consumptive uses of fish and game. Ch. 52, SLA 1986; AS 16.05.258.

By its decision in Kenaitze, the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals has determined that Alaska's current subsistence program is not consistent with ANILCA. The focal point of this decision is the State's definition of the term "rural area". The appellate court has determined that the State has selected a definition:

> [T]hat excludes most areas normally understood to be covered by the term [rural]. As Alaska defines the word, an area is rural only if its economy is dominated by subsistence fishing and hunting; it excludes areas characterized primarily by a cash economy, even though a substantial portion of the residents may engage in subsistence activities.

Kenaitze, 860 F.2d at 316.

In the absence of any definition of the term "rural" in ANILCA, the court of appeals has supplied a definition:

> [A]reas of the country that are sparsely populated, where the economy centers on agriculture or ranching. See Webster's Third New International Dictionary 1990 (1981). More broadly, rural is the antonym of urban and includes all areas in between cities and towns of a particular size. See id.

Id. at 316-17. For the sake of completeness here, we note that the State's current subsistence statute defines "rural area" to mean:

> [A] community or area of the state in which the noncommercial, customary, and traditional use of fish or game for personal or family consumption is a principal characteristic of the economy of the community or area.

AS 16.05.940(25) (emphasis supplied).

It is in the foregoing context that the court has been ordered to enter a preliminary injunction in favor of plaintiff.

The general thrust of the State's proposed preliminary injunction is as follows:

> [Require the State] by May 15, 1990, to either demonstrate to this court that its laws of general applicability are consistent with ANILCA, or, in the words of the Ninth Circuit, to advise "the Department of the Interior that it is withdrawing from its role in administering ANILCA."

State's Suggested Preliminary Injunction at 1. The State's suggestion in substance urges the court to defer entering the preliminary injunction which the court of appeals has ordered for a period of one year. The State no doubt envisions that it might use the one-year period both to obtain a ruling from the United States Supreme Court and, if unsuccessful there, to call upon the State legislature to reconsider and/or reinact its subsistence law. In this regard, the State urges that it not be "stampeded . . . into a position where it must notify the Secretary [of the Interior that] it is withdrawing from ANILCA . . . ." Id. at 2.

The State asks too much. The State has known of the decision of the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals in this matter since shortly after October 24, 1988. The Alaska State Legislature has been in session since January 9, 1989, and will presumably adjourn on or about May 9, 1989. The State of Alaska has had ample opportunity to contemplate the difficulties and the choices which follow the reversal of this court's initial decision. The State has apparently chosen to gamble on judicial relief before the United States Supreme Court. Hopefully, however, the State of Alaska has some undisclosed contingency plan; for, as discussed herein, this district court's hand is controlled at this juncture not by the balancing of hardships or consideration of public policy matters, but by the mandate of the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals. A presently meaningful preliminary injunction in plaintiff's favor must be entered.

Before discussing the plaintiff's proposed preliminary injunction, a further word needs to be said about several aspects of the State's presentation and arguments.

Firstly, the State has argued at some length that plaintiff has other options for the taking of fish during the 1989 season. It also argues that severe economic disruption will result from a change in the status quo, and that any disruption of the status quo will unleash tensions and animosity between sport and subsistence users of Kenai Peninsula fish resources.

As has already been suggested, the decision of the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals leaves no room for these arguments. More generally, however, the State's argument that the plaintiff has other options is unavailing because equal access to fish resources through sport fishing and personal use permits is simply not the equivalent of the priority over other applications of fish resources which both state and federal law have mandated for subsistence uses.

As regards the economic and emotional consequences of the court's action, the State's arguments are equally unavailing. Over ten years ago, the legislature of the State of Alaska elected to afford subsistence users of fish first priority. For many years, little was done to effect that priority, and it is the State of Alaska, its legislators, and its game mangers who must now face the consequences of their decisions and in particular the reluctance of regulators to effectively deal with the subsistence priority. The State's arguments of severe economic consequences to those dependent upon the sport fishery on the Kenai Peninsula for their livelihood are, in a way, proof of the Ninth Circuit's accusation that the State's priorities have not been where they should have been under both state and federal law. The court has great sympathy for the people who will be impacted by this late change in the rules for subsistence fishing; but neither the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals nor this court has any power whatsoever to alter the course of this matter. The choice was in the first instance and is today entirely up to the State of Alaska. Just as was done in 1978, the State and its game managers must decide whether unified management of fish and game on all public lands, both state and federal, in the State of Alaska is worth the price of affording priority above other consumptive uses to subsistence uses of fish and game.

Secondly, the State has filed a flurry of new motions, including a further challenge to this court's jurisdiction and a further challenge of the plaintiff's standing to sue. These motions have the appearance of being tardy, repetitious, dilatory, and, on a preliminary review, substantially without merit. Plaintiff seeks to stay the court's consideration of these motions. The court sees no reason to do so, and plaintiff's motion for stay is denied. The court has received opposition to these motions and will rule upon the same in due course.

Thirdly, the State takes the position that it cannot "adopt regulations consistent with the state laws from which they derive their authority which the Ninth Circuit believes would be consistent with ANILCA." State's Sug- gested Preliminary Injunction at 8. The court takes the latter observation to mean that it is the State's view that it cannot adopt regulations consistent with both extant state subsistence law and ANILCA. The State should reexamine its view of this matter. While the court is obviously without the benefit of any briefing on this subject, the court is not convinced that it would be impossible for the Board of Fisheries to adopt regulations which would harmonize the state law definition of "rural area" and the Ninth Circuit's definition of the term "rural". AS 16.05.940(25); Kenaitze, 860 F.2d at 316-17. Use of the article "a" preceding the term "principal characteristic of the economy" (rather than the article "the") in AS 16.05.940(25) could, in the court's view, make a critical difference in the susceptibility of the State's definition of rural area to being harmonized with the Ninth Circuit's definition of that term. In short, the court is of a view that the Board of Fisheries should consider—if it has not already done so—whether it can scrap the regulatory past which led to the Ninth Circuit's decision herein in favor of an application of AS 16.05.940(25) which would not be offensive to the concept of rural areas being those "in between cities and towns of a particular size." Kenaitze, 860 F.2d at 317.

Fourthly, the State on several occasions in connection with its proposed preliminary injunction suggests that the court may ultimately find it necessary to enter some order to the Secretary of the Interior. Although it is clear that the Secretary might have been joined in this case as a party, this has not happened. ANILCA § 807(a); 16 U.S.C. § 3117(a). The court does not perceive that it can order a non-party to take any action.[1]

[1] The State should not take this observation as an invitation or suggestion that the Secretary should be added, at this late date, as a party to this case.

Plaintiff has also filed a proposed preliminary injunction as requested by the court. Plaintiff's proposal is in a sense at the opposite pole from that of the State of Alaska. Whereas the State's proposal would have this court in substance maintain the status quo for a year, plaintiff's suggested form of preliminary injunction is comprehensive and replete with fine detail aimed at establishing a subsistence fishery for plaintiff on the Kenai Peninsula. Plaintiff's proposal is highly intrusive due to its detail. Plaintiff would have this court make the decisions that the State of Alaska should be making. This court has neither the expertise nor the experience in fisheries management which is available to the State through the Department of Fish & Game. The court views plaintiff's effort as a responsible one; but the court is simply not in a position—especially given the need for speedy action[2]—to seek and obtain expert advice as to the appropriateness of plaintiff's proposal. The State of Alaska (presumably the Department of Fish & Game with the advice of its attorneys) can and should make the choice between continuing the present policy of unified management of state and federal lands with its concomitant requirement that plaintiff's putative subsistence rights be effected on an interim basis, and abandonment of that policy in favor of separate state and federal game management and the differing priorities as to state lands which will then be possible as between commercial and sport fisheries on the one hand and subsistence fisheries on the other hand.

Plaintiff's proposal for preliminary injunction includes an extensive discussion of plaintiff's view of its customary and traditional use of fish. This discussion goes to the merits of an important aspect of this case which has not yet been reached. As discussed above, the only matter now before this court is the entry of a preliminary injunction in furtherance of the mandate of the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals that the plaintiff's purported subsistence fishing rights be afforded priority over other consumptive uses pending the ultimate decision in the case. Accordingly, the court has no need to deal with the "customary and traditional use" issue except to find plaintiff's showing of customary and traditional use of hooligan and all species of salmon which are prevalent on the Kenai Peninsula is sufficient for purposes of a preliminary injunction.

[2] The 1989 salmon fishing season will commence on the Kenai Peninsula in late May or early June.

Preliminary Injunction

The State of Alaska is hereby ordered to elect, on or before May 15, 1989, whether it will or will not afford plaintiff on an interim basis priority over all other consumptive uses for the subsistence use of hooligan and all species of salmon on the Kenai Peninsula.

If the State of Alaska elects to continue its efforts to comply with ANILCA, the State is ordered and enjoined to afford members of plaintiff tribe who reside in rural areas a priority, over all other consumptive uses, for the subsistence use of hooligan and all species of salmon on the Kenai Peninsula; and, to that end, the Board of Fisheries shall, on or before May 30, 1989, adopt emergency regulations to effect such priority. If such regulations are adopted, the regulations and the findings which support them shall be served upon plaintiff and filed with this court on or before May 30, 1989, for review as contemplated by ANILCA § 807(a). 16 U.S.C. § 3117. In the alternative, the State of Alaska and plaintiff may choose to enter into and file with the court for its approval, on or before May 30, 1989, a consent preliminary injunction to the same general effect as this court's foregoing injunctive order.

If the State of Alaska elects not to continue its efforts to comply with ANILCA, the State of Alaska shall so inform the Secretary of the Interior on or before May 15, 1989.

DATED at Anchorage, Alaska, this 25th day of April, 1989.

United States District Judge

APPENDIX B

ALASKA NATIONAL INTEREST LANDS CONSERVATION ACT

Section 102, 16 U.S.C. § 3102

As used in this Act (except that in titles IX and XIV the following terms shall have the same meaning as they have in the Alaska Native Claims Settlement Act, and the Alaska Statehood Act)—

(1) The term "land" means lands, waters, and interests therein.

(2) The term "Federal land" means lands the title to which is in the United States after the date of enactment of this Act.

(3) The term "public lands" means land situated in Alaska which, after the date of enactment of this Act, are Federal lands, except—

(A) land selections of the State of Alaska which have been tentatively approved or validly selected under the Alaska Statehood Act and lands which have been confirmed to, validly selected by, or granted to the Territory of Alaska or the State under any other provision of Federal law;

(B) land selections of a Native Corporation made under the Alaska Native Claims Settlement Act which have not been conveyed to a Native Corporation, unless any such selection is determined to be invalid or is relinquished; and

(C) lands referred to in section 19(b) of the Alaska Native Claims Settlement Act.

Section 801, 16 U.S.C. § 3111

The Congress finds and declares that—

(1) the continuation of the opportunity for subsistence uses by rural residents of Alaska, including both Natives and non-Natives, on the public lands and by Alaska Natives on Native lands is essential to Native physical, economic, traditional, and cultural existence and to non-Native physical, economic, traditional, and social existence;

(2) the situation in Alaska is unique in that, in most cases, no practical alternative means are available to replace the food supplies and other items gathered from fish and wildlife which supply rural residents dependent on subsistence uses;

(3) continuation of the opportunity for subsistence uses of resources on public and other lands in Alaska is threatened by the increasing population of Alaska, with resultant pressure on subsistence resources, by sudden decline in the populations of some wildlife species which are crucial subsistence resources, by increased accessibility of remote areas containing subsistence resources, and by taking of fish and wildlife in a manner inconsistent with recognized principles of fish and wildlife management;

(4) in order to fulfill the policies and purposes of the Alaska Native Claims Settlement Act and as a matter of equity, it is necessary for the Congress to invoke its constitutional authority over Native affairs and its constitutional authority under the property clause and the commerce clause to protect and provide the opportunity for continued subsistence uses on the public lands by Native and non-Native rural residents; and

(5) the national interest in the proper regulation, protection, and conservation of fish and wildlife on the public lands in Alaska and the continuation of the opportunity for a subsistence way of life by residents of rural Alaska require that an administrative structure be established for the purpose of enabling rural residents who have personal knowledge of local conditions and requirements to have a meaningful role in the management of fish and wildlife and of subsistence uses on the public lands in Alaska.

It is hereby declared to be the policy of Congress that—

(1) consistent with sound management principles, and the conservation of healthy populations of fish and wildlife, the utilization of the public lands in Alaska is to cause the least adverse impact possible on rural residents who depend upon subsistence uses of the resources of such lands; consistent with management of fish and wildlife in accordance with recognized scientific principles and the purposes for each unit established, designated, or expanded by or pursuant to titles II through VII of this Act, the purposes of this title is to provide the opportunity for rural residents engaged in a subsistence way of life to do so;

(2) nonwasteful subsistence uses of fish and wildlife and other renewable resources shall be priority consumptive uses of all such resources on the public lands of Alaska when it is necessary to restrict taking in order to assure the continued viability of a fish or wildlife population or the continuation of subsistence uses of such population, the taking of such population for nonwasteful subsistence uses shall be given preference on the public lands over other consumptive uses; and

(3) except as otherwise provided by this Act or other Federal laws, Federal land managing agencies, in managing subsistence activities on the public lands and in protecting the continued viability of all wild renewable resources in Alaska, shall cooperate with adjacent landowners and land managers, including Native Corporations, appropriate State and Federal agencies, and other nations.

Section 803, 16 U.S.C. § 3113

As used in this Act, the term "subsistence uses" means the customary and traditional uses by rural Alaska residents of wild, renewable resources for direct personal or family consumption as food, shelter, fuel, clothing, tools, or transportation; for the making and selling of handicraft articles out of nonedible byproducts of fish and wildlife resources taken for personal or family consumption; for barter, or sharing for personal or family consumption; and for customary trade. For the purposes of this section, the term—

(1) "family" means all persons related by blood, marriage, or adoption, or any person living within the household on a permanent basis; and

(2) "barter" means the exchange of fish and wildlife or their parts, taken for subsistence uses—

(A) for other fish or game or their parts; or

(B) for other food or for nonedible items other than money if the exchange is of a limited and noncommercial nature.

Section 804, 16 U.S.C. § 3114

Except as otherwise provided in this Act and other Federal laws, the taking on public lands of fish and wildlife for nonwasteful subsistence uses shall be accorded priority over the taking on such lands of fish and wildlife for other purposes. Whenever it is necessary to restrict the taking of populations of fish and wildlife on such lands for subsistence uses in order to protect the continued viability of such populations, or to continue such uses, such priority shall be implemented through appropriate limitations based on the applications of the following criteria:

(1) customary and direct dependence upon the populations as the mainstay of livelihood;

(2) local residency; and

(3) the availability of alternative resources.

Section 805, 16 U.S.C. § 3115

(a) Establishment of subsistence resources regions, local advisory committees, and regional advisory councils;

membership, duties, and authority of regional advisory councils. Except as otherwise provided in subsection (d) of this section, one year after the date of enactment of this Act, the Secretary in consultation with the State shall establish—

(1) at least six Alaska subsistence resource regions which, taken together, include all public lands. The number and boundaries of the regions shall be sufficient to assure that regional differences in subsistence uses are adequately accommodated;

(2) such local advisory committees within each region as he finds necessary at such time as he may determine, after notice and hearing, that the existing State fish and game advisory committees do not adequately perform the functions of the local committee system set forth in paragraph (3)(D)(iv) of this subsection; and

(3) a regional advisory council in each subsistence resource region.

Each regional advisory council shall be composed of residents of the region and shall have the following authority;

(A) the review and evaluation of proposals for regulations, policies, management plans, and other matters relating to subsistence uses of fish and wildlife within the region;

(B) the provision of a forum for the expression of opinions and recommendations by persons interested in any matter related to the subsistence uses of fish and wildlife within the region;

(C) the encouragement of local and regional participation pursuant to the provisions of this title in the decision-making process affecting the taking of fish and wildlife of the public lands within the region for subsistence uses;

(D) the preparation of an annual report to the Secretary which shall contain—

(i) an identification of current and anticipated subsistence uses of fish and wildlife populations within the region;

(ii) an evaluation of current and anticipated subsistence needs for fish and wildlife populations within the region;

(iii) a recommended strategy for the management of fish and wildlife populations within the region to accommodate such subsistence uses and needs; and

(iv) recommendations concerning policies, standards, guidelines, and regulations to implement the strategy. The State fish and game advisory committees or such local advisory committees as the Secretary may establish pursuant to paragraph (2) of this subsection may provide advice to, and assist, the regional advisory councils in carrying out the functions set forth in this paragraph.

(b) Assignment of staff and distribution of data. The Secretary shall assign adequate qualified staff to the regional advisory councils and make timely distribution of all available relevant technical and scientific support data to the regional advisory councils and the State fish and game advisory committees or such local advisory committees as the Secretary may establish pursuant to paragraph (2) of subsection (a).

(c) Consideration of reports and recommendations of regional advisory councils. The Secretary, in performing his monitoring responsibility pursuant to section 806 and in the exercise of his closure and other administrative authority over the public lands, shall consider the report and recommendations of the regional advisory councils concerning the taking of fish and wildlife on the public lands within their respective regions for subsistence uses. The Secretary may choose not to follow any recommendation which he determines is not supported by substantial evidence, violates recognized principles of fish and wildlife conservation, or would be detrimental to the satisfaction of subsistence needs. If a recommendation is not adopted by the Secretary, he shall set forth the factual basis and the reasons for his decisions.

(d) Supersedure by enactment and implementation of State laws governing State responsibility; consideration of recommendations by State rulemaking authority. The Secretary shall not implement subsections (a), (b), and (c) of this section if within one year for the date of enactment of this Act, the State enacts and implements laws of general applicability which are consistent with, and which provide for the definition, preference, and participation specified in, sections 803, 804, and 805 , such laws, unless and until repealed, shall supersede such sections insofar as such sections govern State responsibility pursuant to this title for the taking of fish and wildlife on the public lands for subsistence uses. Laws establishing a system of local advisory committees and regional advisory councils consistent with section 805 [this section] shall provide that the State rulemaking authority shall consider the advice and recommendations of the regional councils concerning the taking of fish and wildlife populations on public lands within their respective regions for subsistence uses. The regional councils may present recommendations, and the evidence upon which such recommendations are based, to the State rulemaking authority during the course of the administrative proceedings of such authority. The State rulemaking authority may choose not to follow any recommendation which it determines is not supported by substantial evidence presented during the course of its administrative proceedings, violates recognized principles of fish and wildlife conservation or would be detrimental to the satisfaction of rural subsistence needs. If a recommendation is not adopted by the State rulemaking authority, such authority shall set forth the factual basis and the reasons for its decision.

(e) Reimbursement to State; limitation; report to Congress. (1) The Secretary shall reimburse the State, from funds appropriated to the Department of the Interior for such purposes, for reasonable costs relating to the establishment and operation of the regional advisory councils established by the State in accordance with subsection (d) and the operation of the State fish and game advisory committees so long as such committees are not superseded by the Secretary pursuant to paragraph (2) of subsection (a). Such reimbursement may not exceed 50 per centum of such costs in any fiscal year. Such costs shall be verified in a statement which the Secretary determines to be adequate and accurate. Sums paid under this subsection shall be in addition to any grants, payments, or other sums to which the State is entitled from appropriations to the Department of the Interior.

(2) Total payments to the State under this subsection shall not exceed the sum of $5,000,000 in any one fiscal year. The Secretary shall advise the Congress at least once in every five years as to whether or not the maximum payments specified in this subsection are adequate to ensure the effectiveness of the program established by the State to provide the preference for subsistence uses of fish and wildlife set forth in section 804.

(a) Exhaustion of administrative remedies; civil action; parties; preliminary injunctive relief; other relief; costs and attorney's fees. Local residents and other persons and organizations aggrieved by a failure of the State or the Federal Government to provide for the priority for subsistence uses set forth in section 804 (or with respect to the State as set forth in a State law of general applicability if the State has fulfilled the requirements of section 805(d) may, upon exhaustion of any State of Federal (as appropriate) administrative remedies which may be available, file a civil action in the United States District Court for the District of Alaska to require such actions to be taken as are necessary to provide for the priority. In a civil action filed against the State, the Secretary may be joined as a party to such action. The court may grant preliminary injunctive relief in any civil action if the granting of such relief is appropriate under the facts upon which the action is based. No order granting preliminary relief shall be issued until after an opportunity for hearing. In a civil action filed against the State, the court shall provide relief, other than preliminary relief, by directing the State to submit regulations which satisfy the requirements of section 804; when approved by the court, such regulations shall be incorporated as part of the final judicial order, and such order shall be valid only for such period of time as normally provided by State law for the regulations at issue. Local residents and other persons and organizations who are prevailing parties in an action filed pursuant to this section shall be awarded their costs and attorney's fees.

(b) Priority (repealed). A civil action filed pursuant to this section shall be assigned for hearing at the earliest possible date, shall take precedence over other matters pending on the docket of the United States district court at that time, and shall be expedited in every way by such court and any appellate court.

(c) Section as sole Federal judicial remedy. This section is the sole Federal judicial remedy created by this title for local residents and other residents who, and organizations which, are aggrieved by a failure of the State to provide for the priority of subsistence uses set forth in section 804.

ON PETITION FOR WRIT OF CERTIORARI TO THE UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE NINTH CIRCUIT

PETITIONER'S REPLY MEMORANDUM

The Kenaitze Indian Tribe in its opposition to the State of Alaska's petition asserts that the Kenai Peninsula was classified as rural when Alaska's subsistence program was first certified by the Secretary of Interior ("Secretary") as being consistent with the subsistence provisions in the Alaska National Interest Lands Conservation Act, Title VIII, ("ANILCA"), Pub. L. No. 96-487, 94 Stat. 2371. That is simply incorrect. The state's 1982 regulatory definition of "rural" was not, as described by the Kenaitzes, opp. 8, any area other than a community with a population of 7,000 or more. Rather, that definition included only areas "outside the road connected area of a borough, municipality, or other community with a population of 7,000 or more." Alaska Admin. Code tit. 5, § 99.020 (effective 5/30/82, Register 82, 1982). Under that definition, the Kenai Peninsula Borough did not qualify as rural, since the peninsula has a population of 25,000 and has been connected by road to Anchorage since 1951. Pet. App. A-5, n.2, and 20. Both the ninth circuit and the Kenaitzes acknowledge that the 1982 certification by the Secretary of consistency between Alaska's program and ANILCA is entitled to deference. Pet. App. A-9; opp. 16. That would necessarily include the determination at that time that the Kenai is not a rural area, and thus one of the main premises underlying the Kenaitzes' opposition is simply invalid.

The Kenaitzes also argue, along with the ninth circuit, that an inconsistency within ANILCA would follow from using the state's definition of "rural area." Pet. App. A-14. ANILCA requires that in times of resource shortage, the subsistence priority is to benefit those with "customary and direct dependence" on the resource in question as "the mainstay of livelihood." 16 U.S.C.A. § 3114 (1985). The Kenaitzes and the ninth circuit reason that if subsistence were limited initially to places where subsistence uses already "dominated" the economy, the secondary priority would be rendered meaningless. Pet. App. A-11. Alaska's definition, however, encompasses places where customary and traditional uses are only "a principal characteristic" of the economy, not just areas "dominated" by such uses. Alaska Stat. 16.05.940(25)

(1987). Indeed, individuals for whom use of a particular fish stock or game population is "the mainstay of livelihood" are given special protection under Alaska Stat. 16.05.258(c) (1987), identical to the protection under ANILCA. 16 U.S.C.A. § 3114 (1985). Thus, the purported internal inconsistency identified by the Kenaitzes and the ninth circuit does not exist.

In their opposition, the Kenaitzes insist that Alaska has grafted an impermissible "community residency requirement" onto ANILCA's definition of subsistence uses. Opp. 6 and 7. There is no citation for that supposed state requirement, probably because it does not exist. In fact, in their opposition the Kenaitzes correctly quote the state definition of "rural area" as "a community or area of the state" in which the noncommercial use of fish and game is "a principal characteristic of the economy of the community or area." Opp. 7, quoting Alaska Stat. 16.05.940(25) (1987) (emphasis added).

Finally, the Kenaitzes assert that no practical nor legal problems of any consequence follow from the ninth circuit's decision. Quite to the contrary, in its petition Alaska has outlined the significant problems posed by the ninth circuit's decision for the continued viability of Alaska's fish and game populations, as well as the enormous social and jurisdictional problems facing all Alaskans, and federal as well as state agencies. The United States filed an amicus brief in the ninth circuit on behalf of Alaska, and also filed a petition for rehearing in conjunction with the state's similar petition. The state suggests that it would be appropriate for this Court to solicit the views of the United States on the importance of this matter, both with respect to the real world resource dangers and social and governmental difficulties, and with respect to the legal implications, which range far beyond this set of facts.

For the reasons set out in the petition, and those described here, the ninth circuit's decision should be reviewed and reversed by this Court. The Petition for Writ of Certiorari should be granted, or the decision below should be reversed summarily.
